LOVE OR MONEY.

Poor old Charlie Sefton left the regiment when we were stationed at Delhi and went down to Bombay en route for home. He was our senior captain and the best soldier in the regiment. He was also a rich man, but I did not know for sure, because, being only a doctor and small and plain and getting on for 40.

"Whatever you do don't get married," we all advised as we bade him farewell. Then came the rumor, a week later, that he was still at Bombay, then the telegram to me to go down and serve him as best man.

I went down by the mail train and found awaiting me on the platform Charlie Sefton, who looked as very quiet and as astonishingly happy that I felt a sort of tingling sensation in the clothes. Extreme happiness is always startling.

Miss George, to which I was duly presented, was not in the first flush of her youth. She was quite of perhaps 27 and good looking. But those was no possible doubt of Sefton's chance of happiness. This woman had the right feeling for him.

I was old enough to feel an embarrassment in making an excuse to have them alone together. I had no clothes fit for even the quietest wedding, and telling them so took my leave.

Miss George, it appeared, was traveling in India with friends who, it struck me, were not on a very intimate footing. They were all staying at a hotel from which the wedding was to be unobtrusively celebrated. The couple had only been engaged a week. It is the only case of love at first sight—passion, perhaps, rather, considering—which I have remembered.

My simple duties were duly performed Charlie Sefton and Miss George were declared to be man and wife. I met the company. I heard the declaration. I appended to the entry in the register my name, which looks more as a name on a death certificate. I was doubly sober, as folks are on weddings.

"She is giving up a lot of money to marry him," said Sefton after the ceremony, when he and I happened to be alone for a few minutes.

"And you are giving up a career," I reflected, mindful of many young men married.

But there are some marriages which strike one at once as inevitable. The only question is why the parties concerned have not met sooner. This union was of such a description.

The bride and bridegroom went away from the church with that disconcertingly happy look which makes one feel uncomfortable. They were to sail for home the next day.

I journeyed slowly back to Delhi by a stopping night train, after seeing the last of their boat from the outer pier. As I stepped out of the carriage in the early morning and noted the rain rising from the Jumna, two quartermasters of the Pentinsular and Oriental steamer Rimsona tripped up a plank and proceeded with the dead body of Charlie Sefton into the silvery waters of the Arabian sea. He died one day out from Bombay—of cholera. The thing left a shadow over us which lasted all that hot weather.

In due time we forgot Charlie Sefton. The unmistakable proof of the existence of a sacrificial God is seldom in the facility with which we are permitted to forget.

Years afterward the whole story was suddenly recalled to me at a garden party in a quiet country village near Hadleigh, in Suffolk. I was taken to this entertainment—chiefly remarkable for the number of sharp showers—by a friend of one of the guests. The house was a long low building of, I was informed, the Queen Anne period. The host was a genial old gentleman of an athletic, sailor-like cast, who himself with his own affairs to his entertainment and refrained from writing to the newspapers which position is a special weakness of superannuated admirals. He was enormously proud of his home and seized on me, the only stranger present, to observe its beauties. From the hall I followed the direction indicated by his shaky finger, but instead of noting the carving of a noble mantelpiece the indication of looking into an open window on the first floor.

Then the body of Charlie Sefton came back to my mind, for I saw the woman who had scorned him gliding on her bed before a glass. She did not see me.

I was still with my host when we met Mrs. Sefton face to face.

"Ah," said the old gentleman, with genuine delight, "here is my niece!"

Going forward, I held out my hand.

"How do you do, Mrs. Sefton?"

She looked at me quickly, without a glimmer of the eyelids.

"You are mistaken," she said. "I am Miss Grange."

And with perfect good breeding she looked toward her uncle, inviting an introduction. This the old gentleman accomplished with all the ceremony of the day, mentioning the lady's name as Miss George. It was not a sister. I was not mistaken. This was the woman whom I knew to have been a bride for the space of 48 hours. There was the evidence of an internal trouble beneath the eyes, which I remembered and now saw developed on the itinerary, during years which I had dared not to forget.

We spoke for a few minutes on indifferent topics.

"The doctor is a great traveler," the old gentleman said. "He knows India, my dear."

"Yes," I added, "I know India."

"Ah," answered the most thought worn. "I have not."—Unidentified.

Then my host hurried myself to examine a curved mantelpiece of which I have no resistance at this time. I do not think I even saw it.

"Poor fellow," said the admiral such instances which we were such. "I do not doubt here mistaken. Humor for accuse also, especially married women. You know, dear, in Hindoostan women feel."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, my brother lost his £50,000 on speculations and she married a cavalry man of a regiment. Poor fellow! Also, some time ago, his daughter married the young officer, Charles Sefton, and left her husband. She married a great deal and lost a lot in taxes. I think she still remains single. The man has married more than, you know, Hindoostan."

"Yes," I replied.

I always try to adopt my own business.—National Observer.

A NORTH CAROLINA JERSEY HERD.

What State Can Beat This Record For One Year?

I take pleasure in sending you the statement of the records of the Rockwell Park stock farm herd of Jerseys for 1894, showing an average of 4,904 pounds of milk and 401 pounds of butter per annual. We think the heifers with their first calves have made a very excellent showing and, as you will see, are doing even better with their second calves, and we think that 1895 will show an average per cow of 400 pounds per year. We have 12 heifers that have not yet completed their year's work that are milking from 18 to 22 pounds of milk per day, testing from 3 to 7 per cent, and we know there to be from persistent dates we have every reason to hope for a still better showing.

Horses Kick
is self-defense. It is their most vigorous form of protest against the use of Spurs. Instead of kicking, they should be taught to rear or bear to hold on their shoes. Horseshoe shoe on which each is sprung, and the danger thus is done away.

This is what happens. One part moves up, where it should for stretching, the other goes over the inside foot. Thus sets up the result of the Cold-Shifted and by which the fibres of metal are separated and cut, and the shoe ruined, also lame. Improved. The end of a nail can be easily clinched only by the rough edge along the side near the point.
Putnam Nails are Cold-Forged and Hammer-Pointed, precisely like the old-fashioned hand-made nail. This process makes the point of the nail as tough as the head, and also the nail cannot split. Wear of Shoes and is Absolutely Safe.
Equalize the nails in your outfit by showing this. If they, others are offered, for Cold-Forged Putnam. If your shoe dealer cannot supply you, we will send a sample box on receipt of 50 cents.
Beware that worst plated, stamped on metal of the nails, is always so stamped.
