any effort on the part of any committee to smother legislation. He was not a member of the railroad committee. To compel the committee to report on these bills in two days he thought to be entirely unreasonable, as he had found it difficult at times to get committees together. It was unjust to the committee to compel it to report in a time which might place them at great inconvenience.

Mr. Clark did not say that the committee desired to smother the bills, but only wanted to show the feeling of the business men regarding railroad legislation as the railroad committee had found it.

Mr. Critchlow was surprised to hear a non-member of the committee talk about the unreasonableness of the time limit. "I am a member of that committee and there is no earthly reason why it does not report on some of these bills. There is one bill—it is ... 131—that has been under consideration by the committee time and time again, and a report could be made upon it this afternoon if the committee thought it 'practicable.' This talk of two days being unreasonable is all humbug."

Mr. Beard thought the committee should not be offended if requested to furnish a report to the House. His committee had been asked to hurry up reports at times and he looked upon it as a duty to comply with the request. The railroad committee should regard it in the same light.

The amendment requiring a report at the convenience and according to the ideas of "practicability" of the committee was carried by a vote of 17 to 13.
