SIX O'CLOCK WITH THE POLICE.

A View of the Ceremony of Sending Them Out for Their Night Work.

A very interesting ceremony, with a flavor of military discipline about it, takes place at 6 o'clock every evening in every police station in the city. It is known as roll call, and precedes the departure of the relief force to their all night posts. Usually the desk of the police station are locked during its brief continuance, visitors being requested to stand outside until it is over. A good sample roll call was seen at Captain Cross' station house a few evenings ago.

The minute hand just lacked of the hour when the tramp of marching men was heard, and a column of policemen, two abreast, with a roundsman in command, emerged from the back room. Their clubs hung at their sides, their shoulders were thrown back, and they carried themselves erect and with dignity. They faced about in double rank in front of the desk behind which sat the captain and the sergeant in charge. At an order from the roundsman they opened ranks so as to permit of inspection, and crossed clubs over their chests. Then the roundsman passed down the front rank and in front of the second and back behind it, inspecting the uniforms and equipments. Returning to his position in front he saluted the captain. Captain Cross then opened the roll book and called the roll. Then he rapidly read the night assignments, designating the posts by number and the men who were to occupy them by name. Then he doubled the force on several posts and assigned several men to special duty. He asked:

"On whose post is 500 Eighth avenue?"

"Mine, sir," spoke out a policeman.

"Here is a subpoena from the coroner's office to be served at that address. I think there is a mistake, and the person lives at 300 Ninth avenue. Try at both places if necessary. Jones, 277 West Thirty seventh street, is on your post. I have a complaint here from the lady living there that boys injure her shrubbery. Keep special watch on that house.

"There is a general alarm sent out for a lost boy whose description I will read later. All of you keep an eye sharp open for boys answering to it. Another general alarm is out for a stolen sailboat, sixteen feet long, painted white. Men on river front posts, take special note of all sailboats. Meanwhile, you were ordered yesterday to buy a new hat. Have you done it?"

"Yes, sir," answered a policeman.

"When did you do it?" asked the captain, glancing sharply at the list of day assignments.

"This morning, sir."

"Very good. Jackson, have you bought your hat yet?"

"No, sir."

"Why not?"

"I didn't have time to go down town, sir."

"You had your usual time off today."

"But I didn't think of it then, sir."

"He catches that yes think of it to-morrow. Sinclair, your hat?"

"I'll buy it tomorrow, sir."

"You'd better," said the captain, looking up significantly, while several policemen, who had been being jeeringly at the delinquent. Sinclair, straightened their faces jiu in time to escape being caught.

"Attention!" said the captain. The men straightened up.

"Forward, march!"

The policemen led the line completely around the room to the door and straight out the door, which the doorkeeper had meantime opened. They were a fine looking squad of men. They wore well brushed and neat, their newly blackened shoes shone, and their bearing was erect and soldierly.—New York Sun.

The Indian with a Bow and Arrow.

"The traditional bow and arrow of the American Indian," said a westerner, "are things of the past. The average Indian of today is about as skillful with a bow and arrow as an eight year old boy is within toy pistol. It's very funny to see easterners when they are traveling out west get Indians to show them how they use their old time weapons. The Indian's favorite way of exhibiting his skill is to shoot at a quarter or half a dollar stuck in a split stick. The money of course comes out of the pocket of the eastern man, and the noble red man will shoot at it from a distance of a dozen steps and miss it with the most monotonous regularity. As the small boy would say, he can't shoot a little bit. His weapons nowadays are adopted from the white man.—New York Tribune.

The Big Reservoir.

The oceans and seas are the great reservoirs into which run all the rivers of the world. It is the sixteen which finally catches all the rain that falls not only upon its own surface but upon the surface of the land as well. All of this water is moved again by evaporation as fast as it is supplied, it being estimated that every year a layer of the entire water surface of the globe, over fourteen feet thick, is taken up into the clouds to fall again as rain.

This vapor is fresh, of course; and if all the water of the oceans could be removed in the same way, and none of it returned, it is calculated that there would be a layer of pure salt 230 feet thick left in the bottoms of these great reservoirs. This is upon the supposition that such three feet of ocean water contains one inch of salt, and that the average depth of all oceans is three miles.—St. Louis Republic.

Banana Steamers.

There are at present about forty steamers in the banana trade that are coming and going all the time. These steamers are built for another purpose, and carry from 10,000 to 12,000 bunches each. A banana steamer is a shell. There is but one compartment, and in this compartment the bananas are stood on end in layers from the bottom of the ship to the deck.—New York Herald.

A Question of Hop.

Some years ago a western girl fell for a large amount. During her proceedings growing out of the case it was shown that a trusted employe of a bank had drawn for some time fraudulent transactions on the pass of his superior officers, and had added insult to injury by the crookedness from employers and even from the official bank examiner. The employe was exonerated in the ground that he was only an agent and was under obligations to do as he was told. But some time later the employe sought a clerkship in the government departments in Washington. He was extremely capable and a place was found where he did excellent service. But immediately this operation was raised. Could a person who had thoroughly assisted in fraudulent practices while a bank clerk be permitted to assist in keeping the records of the departments of the government of the United States where scrupulous honesty and exactness were necessary? The election was against the clerk, and he was summarily dismissed. Served him right, too. A person who would knowingly assist in swindling operations, even when his bread and butter depended on it, will never be safely intrusted again with funds belonging to others.

An exactly similar case has lately come up in connection with another bank failure. As far back as ten years ago the assistant cashier helped to hide the bank director's stealings by making false entries till the thefts amounted to $500,000. Never, never again should such a man have any place if trust. Public position can only be held in the farthest corner of the earth as a punishment. He might indeed be permitted to carry a hod to keep the breath of life in his false body, if it was worth carrying, which is doubtful, but to handle money or transact business—nevermore. He could not even be trusted to be honest, since it would be possible for him to steal the honest feed and falsify the return.

High Life in Australia.

Nothing is more peculiar and amusing, not to say instructive, than economy in Australia. Many of the richest and most respected citizens of Ballarat are descendants of notorious criminals, who left their country for their country's good. One third lady in Sydney is the daughter of a man whose countenance used turn and say, whenever his master found fault with him: "Why, sir, I came next to see you not bound. You were sentenced only just in time."

Many years ago some of the most desperate women of London, then believed to be totally depraved, were deported to Australia on a ship called the Red Rover. They were such fierce creatures that on the voyage out these women murdered the ship's doctor. A distinguished lawyer of Sydney is the son of one of the women, possibly one of the very ones who murdered the Red Rover's doctor. So that in Australia it is one where safe to allude in society to the former British penal colonies of the country. For this reason the whole of Australia ought to be a republic. It would make a great row. The older men's family, the less inclination would there be in general to make it prominent. That would do away with at least one nuisance in a republic, that of old families. Most interesting of all, however, to connection with Australian aristocracy is this proof that the most abandoned portion of a community can be taken into the open country, away from criminal associations, and they and their descendants become in time the very backbone and throes of respectable society.

Listen to what the professor of English literature in Columbia college, New York city, says: "Texas may speak ten frankly, there is not in our American literature of today, either in book or magazine, or in published sermons or lectures or speeches, any body is written English so strong and effective, or even so correct, and in the true sense classical in point of style, as we find day after day in the best editorial writing of our American newspapers." Thank you, Professor Price. We have often observed the same thing, and called attention to it. The fact is that a considerable part of the work of the editorial writer is selling down and summarizing the long effusions of scientific and religious writers and college professors, and putting the same in shape so the public will be induced to read their ideas. How much would the public know of their learned essays otherwise?

Persons wanting divorces are hereby warned to hurry up and get them. Commissions have been created by the legislatures of various states to confer together and take measures which, it is hoped, will result in uniform divorce, marriage and inadvisory laws, etc. Divorce, marriage and inadvisory seem to run together naturally in the minds of the promoters of uniformity, so in these three particulars, and especially in the matter of divorce, they will take to secure uniformity of law throughout the country. For the information of those interested, meantime, it may be remarked that South Dakota is the state which at present seems to be most obliging in the matter of freeing husbands and wives who desire to get rid of each other.

Gambling in Great Britain has become greatly prevalent of late years from the slums to the royal circle. A local investigation shows also that it prevails in the university of Oxford "in a scandalous extent."

The Elfish Kingdom was a new Mrs. George Gould to partner, rarer and more bewitchingly attractive than ever, and to shed charm in the palatial home she adorns.

Chromos will not carry on a business enterprise.

Was Sir John Macdonald a statesman or only a politician? The weight of evidence seems to incline to the politician's end of the scale.

Contribution to Australia.

You don't hear much about them, but there are cannibals in Australia to-day. Strange? Well, not so very when you take into consideration the character of the country. The blacks or lockjaws who wear beaded shorts, and when you get a short distance from civilization you will find that the majority of them wear no apparel of any description. The Australian thinks more about the outer relation in this country than the American savage does to this. When you get away from the cities into the bush you will find plenty of them who would kill you, and there is nothing they would relish better than to make a barbecue out of you, provided that there was no chagrined being around.

Collectively they have the greatest fear of the white man, for they know that he punishes severely. They prefer to eat their victims. A man they consider very good, but as a rule they lack the utensils and means of making broth. When a plump white stranger is captured and killed, the body is carefully prepared. It is then bound to a stout green pole, which in turn is supported at either end, about two and one-half feet from the earth, by forked sticks. Between the sticks a fire is built, and when the proper number of coals are made the green pole with its choice morsel is put atop, and it is then permitted to simmer and roast until it is done to a turn, the man eaters occasionally sticking their knives into the body to test the degree of doneness.—Interview in Kansas City Times.

Four Kinds of Avalanches.

Colonel H. C. Tanner, of the Indian staff corps, has seen a great deal of the Himalayan skirmishing work, and distinguishes four types of avalanche among them. The first and commonest is simply the sliding of a mass of snow on the steep slopes, and is frequent in winter or spring. The second type is a rush of old snow, melted by the heat of the sun, and it occurs in summer or autumn, when then its subsidence is dangerous to travelers, who ought to pitch their camps out of the way. The third type occurs in mountains of peculiar formation, and is a mixture of ice and snow glazed by the broken end of a glacier projecting over the crests of ridges or cliffs. The fourth type has only been seen by Colonel Tanner once, and seems never to have been described by other travelers.

Hunting on that one day in an elevated valley of the Gilgit hard mountains he saw to his surprise what appeared to be millions of snowballs rolling down the hill of a current in a mass a rule mile half long. The balls were about the size of a man's head, and rolled over each other. Behind them came no theory of their formation; but the bed of the current was filled with old balls, proving that other avalanches of the sort had occurred there.—London Globe.

Somebody Was Waiting.

An absent man's husband recently took place in a large drapery establishment in London. Being told that everything could be bought much cheaper and better in the metropolis than in the little country town where she lived, good looking, honest faced girl, about to be married, made the journey to town, accompanied by her lover, to do the shopping. The inexplicable of an great shop, the piles and piles of goods, the dazzling array of attendants, the score of busy assistants, quite overcowed her, and she scarcely knew what to do. Her swain obstinately refused to go in, but loitered about the door.

The shop assistants being all busy at the moment, the young lady was obliged to remain standing a few moments. At length a dapper fellow with gold watch and chain and Sorbonne mustache came bowing and smiling up to the blushing customer with "Anybody waiting on you, madam?" The other dropped in his tracks, as she hesitated and drew a long breath, till finally, with a nod of her head toward the door, she faltered out, "Yes, sir, he is."—London Tit-Bits.

A Valued Memento of General Grant.

The papers are publishing a paragraph about a New York banker still owning a cigar General Grant gave him, and he has affidavits showing the presentation was made at the Overlook Mountain House. This reminds us of a scene on the ferry boat at West Point one summer's day about a year after the close of the war. General Grant was on the boat in a carriage, coming over to board a southbound train on the Hudson River railroad. He was smoking the stump of a cigar. There were about 200 Eastern students on the boat.

Suddenly the general, having finished his cigar, threw it on the deck of the boat. There was a great scramble for it by the students, one from Kentucky getting it. As he put it in his vest pocket he exclaimed, "I wouldn't take $100 for it. I'm going to take it home and have it labeled and framed." He was offered $10 for it on the boat.—Poughkeepsie Eagle.

Just and Generous.

A family of decent Scotch people were very exemplary in their observance of religious duties, and were accustomed to read a portion of the Scriptures every morning and evening before offering prayer. One morning the head of this family happened to read the chapter in which an account is given of Samson catching 300 foxes. When it was finished the old gudeman's wife interrupted him by saying, "John, I'm sure that cannot be true, for no Isaac was so good a fox fighter as there ever was in the country, and he never caught but about twenty." "Hegsh, Janet!" said he, "ye mauna always tak' the Scriptures just as it reads. Perhaps in the 300 there might be been eighteen or twenty twenty that were real foxes. The rest were all skunks and woodchucks."—Boston Advertiser.
