A QUEER NEWSPAPER

THE OSTRICH OF CORNWALL AND ITS ECCENTRIC PUBLISHER.

A Journal That Exists in Opinion and Devotion to a Remote Cause—The Paper Continuously Distributed, but It and the Editor Are Sustained by Donations.

In the heart of Cornwall there is published and read a newspaper perhaps without parallel in all the world. This is The Ostrich, and if the news of the day, its mundane events and sensations should stack you as a dead four between sixes, there is nothing in the way paper for you to read.

To begin with this singular Cornish journal is printed on a delightful pale rose colored paper. It has a great and ever outlying circulation. Throughout Cornwall you see it everywhere. From Tintagel to Land's End genial old squires and parsons, stately civil maids, spectacled elderly ladies, young bloods in cricket flannels or hunting breeches, farmers, fishermen and laborers may be seen peacefully perusing these rose hued pages. And every one can see that the form of Ostrich renders possess a settled look of placidity, just as if nothing in the world could disturb them.

"Yes," said the proprietor of a Penzance hotel, "The Ostrich is a wonderful paper. It settles the nerves and brings back health and happiness. All people coming from the large towns seeking rest should read it. It is a boon for the nervous."

One sees The Ostrich, and the first thing noticeable is that certain words in the type are printed in large, heavy type, words like happy, good, a, sweet, women, health, peace, beautiful, amiable—all the pages are crowded with them, so that they give the impression of being a kind of optimist chart, pointing out all that is good and beautiful on this earth. Most sighted people, taking the newspaper as a patent medicine, will only be able to see these agreeable words and besides this, in the ordinary text, all words like death, misfortune, sickness, pain are carefully avoided. In the entire paper, one column excepted, not a disagreeable word is printed.

The success of the publisher is based on the science of suggestion. All most people are easily influenced, the perusal of a page of this rose colored paper, with its hundreds of pleasant words, may mollify bring the reader to a state of mind in which he begins distinctly to see the world through rose colored glasses.

The paper is appropriately called The Ostrich. A little picture in the middle of the leading expounds this famous bird burying its head in the sand and apparently feeling well assured in doing so. The motto of the paper is "Even of Truth One-half is Falsehood." This paper runs up all that has happened in the world, some weekly—in, not more than six columns—politics, clothing, accidents, art and literature. Everything is treated by The Ostrich in these columns from his special viewpoint.

The first column bears the title, "What World is It We Are in?" R. H. D. stands for Sir Humphry Davy, who was born in Penzance and has a monument there. This "great Christian and chemist," as The Ostrich calls him, the inventor of the safety lamp, is the model of all human beings, the yardstick with which everything is measured. In this column one finds all sorts of news, and every item with a commentary. For instance: "At a banquet at Farnborough Lord Salisbury declared that the situation of the Armenians was indeed such as demanded serious consideration (R. H. D. would say: 'The consideration only becomes serious by Lord Salisbury's calling it so. There may be loss in the matter than one would expect')? Or, "The potato beetle is again making himself a nuisance on our coast (not in Normandy, for there they have no potato harvest at all this year): R. H. D.)."

The second column is called "The Demented of Tomorrow." In it all important political news is commented upon and corrected, for the motto of the paper is "Even of Truth One-half is Falsehood," and many of the corrections of The Ostrich are sound. Besides, if to make a mistake, it does not matter. The aim is reached at all events, for none that leave the leading "Demented" is decided and has lost its exciting quality.

Still more important is the third column, "How Does This Concern Me?" In it one finds the greatest wisdom of The Ostrich. It contains all the news from foreign countries, and the reader generally sympathizes in measures with the publisher, for what is it to him whether President Meline or Dupuy is prime minister of France, whether Sagasta or the Liberals are in power in Spain, whether Crispi or Rudini is premier of Italy, or whether Lord Salisbury or Lord Rosebery is premier of England? Or, "The potato beetle is again making himself a nuisance on our coast (not in Normandy, for there they have no potato harvest at all this year): R. H. D.)."

If it chances to be one last rule, this spoils the wisdom or jolted over into Lancashire. There the publication finished officer will gave as it is his heart's content, but it was beyond his jurisdiction. In the same way the sheriff of Lancashire found the first successfully chased all his most vigorous attempts to surprise it on the side of the line. Each officer was at liberty to make the capture in his own township but the clerks was spirited and the first to a life of enjoyment. But the same rivalry between the sheriff was also the protection, for their professional jealousy of each other prevented them from trying the clearly feasible plan of joining their forces and running the foot down into the township of the line.

After a few months of this life J. retired from it, and there is a comfortable competency and a feeling of satisfaction at the series of adventures from which he had always escaped to the venue.—New York Tribune.

LESSONS FROM THE OYSTER.

Many a Pearl of Wisdom to Be Gleaned From Its Life.

The oyster is jaw-continually a creature of habit, and is consequently has much time at his disposal for thinking and reflection, and in the absence of food to the contrary we are obliged to accept the deduction that he employs that time profitably. Though he may keep his wisdom to himself and employ it for his own use, he certainly has found a light knowledge that is a blessing to others. In a fight in the water, from the question of water supply and drainage to one that he never has to answer himself about.

He manages also that the water shall bring him food, and he consequently notices of commerce of supply and demand, the prices of commodities and other questions which worry other members of the animal creation, whether they are quadrupeds or bipeds, whether they are fish, flesh, or feathered, whether they fly through the air or swim in the water do not concern him. As for his house, as soon as he settles down, after a very brief period of wandering and acting his wise care he builds a house of eight sides of the mineral brought to him by the accommodating water, and thereafter he lives a life of ease.

He knows perfectly well that things will come to him. He doesn't even bother with having legs and eyes, for he has no need of transportation; he does not need to see in order that he may gather his food and he finds no necessity for his mouth being kept and shut exclusively during his nervous organization. He sits down under his food, if not under his own vine and fig tree, and enjoys a life of quiet and dignity. He has enemies, but he does nothing to alienate them, and he knows all religious and political controversies, and he thinks perhaps he retains the good will of all the citizens of the land and sea. There are many lessons indeed to be gleaned from the life of the oyster that we might learn and follow with profit.—Pittsburg Dispatch.

Music in a Tomb.

When in Greece, I twice heard concerts in strange places. On the first occasion a musical society of Patras gave an entertainment on the very summit of Mount Parnassus, several hundred feet above the ancient site of Apollo's. The number of instruments was about 20, and the audience amounted to five thousands.

Another entertainment of this nature in Greece was at a musical performance which took place in the tomb of Agamemnon at Mycenæ, on the occasion of the visit of a philhelenic society of Nauplia to the ancient residence of the "king of kings."

The tomb keeps some resemblance to a pyramid, and the interior is divided into a vast hall and a smaller chamber for the sarcophagus; the dark vase it inside that the tomb had to play by sunlight. The performance may have been somewhat ghostly, but it was decidedly original.—Pearson's Weekly.

Children of the Sun.

We have been called "children of the sun," and there is truth as well as poetry in the designation. Year by year the map of science rings himself a little closer to the great celestial orb. Science Parsley in his mind's eye sees lines of force traversing space, and which, for great distance Maxwell bequeathed to us the electro magnetic theory of light, men of science felt that a point had been reached at which the name of solar separates. The sun to human alone is a giver of heat and light only, for to the other wave movables waves of every description. Children of the sun we regard not only to the great periodic changes, but to every passing spasm and disturbance. Auroras are associated with solar change. In studying them we may hitherto the secrets of the sun.—"What is an Aurora?" by Alexander McAdie, in Century.

What He Took.

The Louisville Post says that three men walked into a Louisville drug store the other day and one ordered drinks. He asked one of the others asked for soda water, and then the third surprised he the third.

"What will you have, sir?"

The man looked at the one who was treating and said:

"You know I don't like soda, John."

"Then, turning to the clerk, he said:

"Give me a dose of castor oil."
