The Theatre.

Sol Smith Russell is always a welcome visitor to Salt Lake, and the presentation of his play, "The Poor Relation," drew a much better house than greeted him when here before. The play itself though possessing small merit, and depending as it does entirely on Mr. Russell, went with great applause and appreciation. Though Mr. Russell, as he himself states in a characteristic speech before the curtain, has been before the public over twenty years, his humor is just as refreshing and his personal charm just as great as when we first beheld him. He is a big man outside of a dime museum freak could look the attenuated starving poor relation as does Mr. Russell. His humor is irresistible, while his pathos is of the most tender and touching color. The children, as is nearly always the case in a play, make a strong feature, and the little ones played themselves at once into the hearts of their audience. Mr. Albery, who did the part of the old natural in "Little Lord Fauntleroy," though possessing nothing of a part, did what he had to do well. In this piece it matters but little how the balance of the cast do their parts. Mr. Russell undoubtedly appreciated this fact when he made his selections, for outside of the two mentioned the acting was decidedly in as high as they climb.

The piece was to be done for a matinee this afternoon, and the evening performance brings out his new play "A Peaceful Valley."
