OGDEN.

OGDEN, UTAH, Dec. 18, 1894.

Flagmen Now.

A flagman has been appointed for the east side of the Twenty-fourth street railway crossing, and in a few days another is to be stationed on the west side. The men will do duty from 7 a. m. to 7 p. m. Superintendent S. W. Knapp has under consideration the placing of gates at the crossings and the erection of a tower giving a full view of the entire yards. From this tower one man could operate the gates.

Notes.

Licenses to marry were issued to Charles R. Swenson, 22, and Miss Carrie Datis, 21, both of Harrisville, and William N. Baker and Miss Jane Hammond, both of Hooper.

No report from the grand jury yesterday. Humor has it that they are investigating election irregularities in the second precinct.

Chief Binford of the fire department has appointed M. J. Hewat, formerly captain, to succeed Abe Levy as assistant chief, and H. A. Graves, formerly lieutenant, will be captain. The appointments have been approved by the board.

CRISPING CORN.

Stack Clean and Do Not Crib Until the Corn Is Dry to the Cob.

One may easily begin cribbing too soon. Getting the corn in the crib too early is even more disastrous than leaving it in the field too long. Corn first heats and molds in the crib is altogether damaged. Every ear rotes its neighbor. And so the catastrophe takes place last round the outside of the crib, where the corn is exposed freely to the air, the damage is apt to have made a lamentable progress in the interior before it is discovered; unless one is very watchful indeed. It will not stop the heating and molding to throw the top off the crib. That is the worse thing one can do. The damage may be mitigated by spreading the corn out in a dry, airy place.

Be sure the corn is cured and then go ahead and as fast as you can. Corn can be fed when it will not be fit to crib for two to six weeks.

That corn may keep properly in a crib it must not be husked until cured. It must be husked clean, and the crib must shelter it from the weather. Corn should not be cribbed until it is dry—feels dry, down to the very cob. It may be cribbed when wet with rain (if well cured) without appreciable damage, if not too much of it is put in the crib, but undoubtedly it is better to have it dry altogether when cribbed. By clean husking, says a Country Gentleman correspondent, I mean removing the silk as well as the husk and removing all the husk. When the silk is not removed and when "ribbons" in the crib are frequent, the chances of molding are increased, and the depredations of mice are multiplied. The mice are highly pleased by the juxtaposition of bedding and food.

Husk and silk absorb moisture and hold it. Very few in the west remove the silk. Yet it is so hurtful as the quantity of husk that would condemn a husker's work as decidedly slovenly. The husbandmen that do not remove the silk claim that to remove it takes time; that the corn that remains in it dries much more rapidly than that from which it is stripped. My observation is to the contrary. Of the husbands of my acquaintance those that remove the silk put as much corn in the crib as those that do not. The latter assert that removing the silk requires an extra "pass," which is true. The man that pays no attention to the silk in husking catches the ear as he bats with his left hand, strips back the upper half of the husk with his right hand, and then catching the ear with the right hand he lifts it out of the husk and breaks it off. The man that removes the silk catches the point of the ear, in pulling the silk, with his left hand, strips back the upper half of the husk with his right hand, pushes his left hand to the butt of the ear and breaks off the ear with his right hand. The left hand is passed to the butt of the ear while the right hand is being brought back from the upraised end of the husk to the center of the ear, and a hold is gained. So there is really no loss of time, or, if there is, it is so small that it is balanced by the ear being always clean of husk, while the man who does not strip back the lower half of the husk occasionally has to stop to pull off "ribbons" after the ear has been lifted from its bed.

OBITUARY NOTES.

MARY H. S. LAMBERT.

CHATWORTH, Dec. 16, 1894.—Died at Coalville, November 27th, 1894, of typhoid fever, Mary Hannah Salmon Lambert, daughter of the late Bishop Robert Salmon, and beloved wife of Thornton Lambert.

Deceased was born at Harbord, Sequed, on the 25th of October, 1868. She emigrated to Utah with her parents in 1880, crossing the Plains in Captain White's company in the fall of 1880, the parents settling in the Weber river in Summit county when they arrived in Utah, and deceased has resided in this county ever since. She was married to Thornton Lambert in the Endowment House in Salt Lake City in April, 1888. Deceased was a loving wife, a kind and indulgent mother and a faithful Latter-day Saint, and died in full faith of a resurrection of the righteous and blessings of the temple. She leaves a husband and three children, numerous relatives and a host of friends to mourn her untimely demise.—[COMMUNICATED.]
