A Brutal Murder.

(Special Dispatch to the NEWS.)

SUNDANCE, Wyo., Dec. 27.—Word has reached the city of the brutal murder of John Myers, a ranchman residing on Alva creek. A neighbor seeing Myers's place on Sunday noticed that his gate was open and some stock running loose in the yard. He went to the house to ascertain what was the matter. The first object that met his gaze when he opened the door was Meyers's body lying on the bed with a deep cut in the forehead and his feet and legs turned to a chip. A large hole was turned in the floor showing that the house had been set on fire. Mr. Meyers was evidently murdered and an effort made to burn his dwelling to cover up the crime.

Mr. Meyers shipped a carload of cattle to Chicago about a week ago and it was generally known that he was in the habit of keeping a considerable sum of money about him. He was a single man about 60 years of age and lived alone on his ranch. He leaves property valued at $10,000.

Tuesday night, for the first time, a woman was on the board of regents in Kansas, when the wife of Governor Lewelling, Mrs. Lease, was appointed. It is generally believed that the name Mrs. Ida M. Clark of Topeka, secretary of the Kansas World's Fair commission, is being made to pitch up the board between the Garfield and Mrs. Lease. Mrs. Lease says she has called a meeting of the Board of Charities to be held at Winfield next week. She intends she expects to preside over the meeting.

The complaint states that while plaintiff was traveling by one of the company's cars on November 18, of the present year, on Fifth West street, the car was carelessly and negligently run over the crossing and thrown from the Rio Grande Western railroad on that street, by a train which a train was passing at the time. OVER A COVERNESS.

THE ROMANCE OF THE FRENCH PRINCE IMPERIAL.

The following is the substance of a romantic tale which is running through the French and English papers:

When the prince imperial was 22 years of age he was a student at Woolwich. One day he made the acquaintance of a young lady whom he admired and by whom he was admired. A love affair was started immediately and in due time there happened what often happens in such cases—the young lovers told their affection and proved it. At this time the young woman was ignorant of the rank and title of her lover. As the empress was very close-fisted, almost miserly, she gave very little money to her son. He was kept down to small allowance, and he passed himself off as a young man whose family had small resources. It was under these conditions that the first chapter of the romance opened.

The prince imperial was bright, educated and generous, doubtless he met his young woman. She was a governess named Mary Watkins and was the daughter of the head gamekeeper of Chislehurst. As long as possible she kept her love affair a secret, and at last went to live at 87 Jermyn street, London, where her prince sent her numerous letters and telegrams under the name of Watkins. He gave her at 4000. On his departure for Zululand he gave her £500. She did not at first know who the lover, but one day she was greatly surprised at seeing her lover chatting familiar with Lord Beaconsfield at the entrance of the Brompton oratory on the occasion of the marriage of the duchess of Norfolk.

In due time a baby appeared and brought a crop of trouble to the imperial lovesick. The empress was made aware of the fact, and was greatly shocked. As she was then, and is still, on the best of terms with the queen, she hoped to bring about the marriage of her son to the youngest daughter of her majesty. She received in track of her attachment for Mary Watkins, and advised or ordered him to depart at once for Zululand. The prince obeyed, and the rest is known.

After his death Mary Watkins, with her son, presented herself at Camden House, but the empress would not see her. She did not want anything, and never asked anything of the empress. She went to Paris, and the child with a friend in Bourg, and set out for Montmartre, where she is still entering her living as a governess. Princess Mathilde was the first to become interested in the child, and she would perhaps be successful in her search. At all events, it was related to find out why the empress seems so often in Paris, and is in the opposite side in company with a young collection, the mystery might easily be cleared up. The other authorities in Chislehurst have a record of all these facts, and are aware of all the facts in the case.

BUSINESS AND MINES.

Judge Walliser Speaks in Behalf of Beaver County.

SHE IS PROSPEROUS AND HEALTHY

A Place for Enterprise, Capital, Industry and Workers.—To 500 Winter Fair.—Various Items.

W. W. Walliser, probate judge of Beaver county, is a firm believer in the prosperous future of his county. He is full of information regarding the resources of his county, and is filled with a commendable desire to let the public know of the advantages of Beaver as a place for businessmen. He says regarding the county: At no time since the first settlement of the country have times been more prosperous. While other parts are quite badly affected by the prevailing depression in business, Beaver county is moving along the even tenor of its way. As it never enjoyed the speculative benefits of a "boom," it has none of the evils thereof to recover from.

Judge Walliser states that the climate of Beaver is hard to equal. The atmosphere is dry and the winters mild and pleasant. On account of the mild winters the valley is particularly adapted to the raising of fruit. The county contains about fifty miles north and south and forty-five miles east and west. In this 1,600 square miles there are 45,000 acres of tillable land, which in the county assessment roll is valued at $900,000. This is exclusive of the university lands, consisting of 5,000 acres, which will be sold this winter.

Taking the rolls of the county assessor as a basis, Beaver county has about 6,000 horses, valued at $204,000; 19,000 cattle, valued at $190,000; 75,000 sheep, valued at $150,000. The total valuation of taxable property outside of mines and a half million. There are 32 miles of telegraph line in the county, but only 11 miles of railway.

Beaver was first settled in 1856, but as Indian was the most two years compelled the settlers to abandon their homes, so that it was 1871 before permanent settlements were established. The people have built some 150 miles of irrigating canals, exclusive of laterals, and there are 17 canal companies. The Beaver canal, owned by Don Sevoyan, and therefore no bonded or floating debts.

The Beaver valley is very fertile, and the mountain sides afford pastures for vast herds of cattle, horses and sheep. The alfalfa and grain crops are very heavy. Of fruits there can be produced, the judge says, five tons to the acre, and as high as 52 bushels of wheat and 87 bushels of barley to the acre has been realized. There, of course, were special instances, and do not represent the average yield.

There are two mountain ranges passing through the county, the Wasatch and the Tushits, the summit of the latter divides Beaver from Millard county. Throughout these mountains building stone of superior quality abounds in great variety, and is easily accessible to all the settlements.

The county seat, Richfield, has about 2,000 inhabitants, and is located in a rich farming district, the soil being red clay loam. Richfield is located at the junction of a system of canals shown to be twice which have been found. It has two steam planing mills, a steam flouring mill, a grain elevator with a capacity of 5,000 bushels, and good school and church buildings. A new court house was completed the past summer, at a cost of about $13,000. A new court house, which Judge Walliser says is the best building of the kind outside of Salt Lake City, was erected at the last session at a cost of some $14,000. Richfield is situated miles from Salina, the railway terminus.

Monroe, ten miles south of Richfield, and in a similar section of farming country, has a population of 1,200. There are warm springs near Richfield, but at Monroe there are hot springs of high medicinal value. There are in the town a flouring mill, a planing mill, a furniture factory and good school and church buildings. The place is the residence of a number of wealthy cattle and sheep owners, and beautiful streets and good residences are characteristic of the town.

Salina, the terminus of the Rio Grande Western southern branch, has a population of 1,500, and is at present the most important commercial town in southern Utah. The railway company has some good buildings there. While the surrounding district is a rich farming country, the soil is different to that further south in being a black clay loam. There is in process of construction at Salina a stone public school building which will cost $12,000. There are also good church and school buildings, a flouring mill and a planing mill, each, says, has a superior quality of gypsum located in the mountains to close proximity to the town, while a few miles up the canyon alum and coal have been discovered in large quantities. Several salt works are engaged in a small way in manufacture of salt, and there is room for the profitable employment of capital in an extensive line in this industry. The sheep and cattle interests of the town are also large. Judge Walliser says of Salina's prospects: "My reason of the business the town cannot help treading as important railway center at no distant day. It is situated at the mouth of Salina canyon, which is the natural gateway of a large section of country between the west and the east. The Denver & Rio Grande is penetrating the Wasatch range, and most of lines are now used by railways and the grades are very steep. Engineers who have surveyed the Salina pass report a grade of only one per cent in one direction and two per cent in the other. From this we argue that Salina is destined to a bright future." The stream in the vicinity of the town are well filled with trout, and fishing the early spring and summer and should there be any in the county hunters.

Beaver is a mining district of Utah, is a mining district in miniature. The mineral belt is 15 miles long and 3 miles wide. The ledges are very rich in silver, lead and gold. The ledges are generally speaking, fissure ledges, and are in the form of a fissure. The ledges are in the form of a fissure. The ledges are in the form of a fissure. The ledges
