HOW SHE TOOK IT.

She was dressing very carefully and exquisitely for the Haverons' dance, and yet with a certain nervous obstruction. Now and then she would stand still, lost in imaginings. Then she would set her teeth and dress resolutely for a spell. Clearly it was not easy to rehearse a scene of reproach and scorn and to put in pointed sarcasms simultaneously. But she realized that a perfect confidence in her own appearance might materially facilitate her courage when the moment for the scene came, and that the moment should come tonight and at the Haverons' dance she was fully and desperately determined.

Surely it ever a man deserved punishment at the hands of woman that man was Ashby Eldon. He had behaved unfortunately.

She had met him for the first time at Nice in the early part of this winter. She was there with an enervated child. He was there on mere pleasure and had given her to understand that he had fled from a hideous atmosphere of tiresome adulation in London to bathe his soul in pure sunshine. He had talked culture and personalities in perfect proportion. He had been charming, had worn striped linen, a pointed beard and a smile of fascinating fatigue. He had delayed her with expensive flowers. At first these flowers had come with a name card. A little later the card was often inclosed in a sealed envelope and covered with some engagative little quotation from the French or German poets.

Still later the flowers had come without a word, bearing their own message, and when he added a spray or two to her dress he would perhaps steady his eyes on hers for a moment, hold her hand the fraction of a second too long for mere convention—or tell her in a thousand wordless ways that she was a charming woman in his eyes, and that he knew she knew it. And never a hint or sign of his engagement to that Miss Trevors! It was inconsiderable—inexplicable!

If he had not mentioned by chance that Lady Haverton was his aunt, if on her return from Nice she had not taken enormous trouble to cultivate Lady Haverton and lead her talk on to Ashby Eldon, she might have dwelled in her fools paradise to the day of his wedding announcement.

"Well, the days of woman's "silent suffering" were over now, thank heaven! She had been reading a striking article on this theme in some magazine only last week. A woman was no longer a man's plaything—she was his equal, his rival, and tonight she would prove it. She would speak her mind honestly, grandly, without flinching. She would crush every detail of the traitor. He would be standing in the recovery of the ballroom when she arrived. She would pass him by. He would speak to her, and she would raise her eyebrows in calm surprise, answering in icy terms. But he should write his name on her programme, and when his duties came around she would ask him to sit with her. Serenely she would lead the way to an empty room—the little boudoir at the back of the conservatory. And then—

How she would toss him with her weapons of scorn and disgust. She would make him feel like a cur.

The bitter words seemed insufficient punishment when she thought what suffering he might have caused her. It was the sweet chance that she had not lost her heart to him—the merest chance. Why did the fire in the glass twitch so she said that? She would say it again and say it confidently. It was the purest piece of luck that she had not fallen in love with Ashby Eldon. He had done his best. He was a brute. Yes, he was. She didn't care. He was.

Her tiresome red eyelids would make one look! They took all the poetry out of white satin shoes. Richard had also been the fool to choose her pink silk for tonight! And what would it matter if she wore green tulle! Hideful world!

It was proud of the Haverons'. Eleven o'clock and he was not there.

He danced a great deal.

Half past 11 and he was not there.

He was getting too tired to smile.

Half past 12 and he was not there.

She was getting too tired to smile.

She must go home now.

"Good night, Lady Haverton—a delightful evening." Yes, she was feeling a little tired. Good night once more and out on to the cabriole.

Startled pleasure! There he came—slowly, languidly—by the oil way. Quick! That was she getting to say at the very first—oh, what!

"Miss Fendon, an unexpected pleasure!"

A wave seemed to wash over her frame. She took his proffered hand, and her eyes fell for one second. Then she looked up with a brilliant society smile. Her old resolution by chance had lit upon a completely different set of emotions had taken possession of her—unconsciously, unquestionably.

"Ah, you are back in the vortex, Mr. Eldon—the dear old vortex!"

"Yes!" A faint suspicion of awkwardness quilled his usually perfect manner. "Yes, I am just do return. How kind of people to give these little soirees at this time of the year—when there is positively no other way of getting warm!"

"And I am ungrateful enough to be freezing away now. There is so much going on at the opera—isn't there?"

"But you will give me a few words before you go? Come down stairs and let us retire to the memory of dear old Nice! And—and I have news."

"Your engagement, and I was forgetting my congratulations!" He took breath. "How unpardonable of me, but really so many of my friends have taken the first step just lately I'm getting quite confused. Is your fiance here?"

"Oh, unfortunately!"

"Ah, my misfortune, I am sure. Well, it leaves me something to look forward to. Good night, Mr. Eldon, and thank you. Come for your future business. There's my chaperon. I must fly."

She passed a friendless hand. There was a look of surprised disappointment on his stunning face. And yet he gave another long sigh of relief as he turned into the ballroom.

"Wonderful luck! But somehow I thought she'd take it differently," said he to himself.

And she drove home. Only when she got to her own room and remembered just what she had meant to say and just what she had said did she see the humor of it, and thereupon she cried.—Exchange.

Waiting for Mike.

Michael Sullivan, an old soldier, is relating his experiences in the Crimea. "The commander in chief rides up as the army is about to lose of battle and he tells me:

"'Is Mike Sullivan in the ranks?'

"'Here I am, general,' sez Oi.

"'Mike, be the engagement begin,' sez he.—London Tit-Bits.

Had to Say It.

He—I have called on you seven years, Miss Waite. All this time I have just naturally loved you. Tomorrow or the next day I shall probably come up and ask you to marry me. What will you say?

Miss Waite (confusedly)—Oh, this is sudden!—London Fun.

Traffic has been interrupted on the West Jersey Pennsylvania railway, owing to the fall of numerous acres of rock or stone in a height of 250 feet above the track.
