FIRST LOVE.

How old could I have been at that time?

I am quite sure I was only about twelve or thirteen years old. Or I might have been fourteen. Surely, I was old enough to fall desperately in love.

If I cannot recollect when, I can at least remember how the tender passion commenced. As soon as my aunt would leave the house, to repair to church for her evening devotions, I was very fond of seating into her room and rummaging her bureau drawers, which she always kept in admirable order. Those drawers were like a museum to me, for I always found some rare, quaint objects there, and a subtle eastern perfume exuded from them. There were pale pincushions, dressed and by some lone maiden laid away in these pincushions, thereby retaining the secret of the nights of her youth.

From that moment onward I could not get the miniature out of my thoughts.

Whenever my aunt went out I would slip up into her room, open the case, take out the picture and become absorbed in looking at it. After I had gazed long enough it was easy to fancy that the drooping eyes of my idol, glancing through their thick shade of lashes, fixed themselves on mine and that her bosom heaved with quickened feeling. I was even ashamed to kiss her, fearing that my ardently might displease her, so I only pressed her to my heart or placed my cheek close to hers. All of my thoughts and acts bore some relation to the fair dame in dire in the golden case.

I began felt counter scruples in regard to her, and before I would enter my aunt's room to look at the crowded miniature I would dress myself in my very best, as I observed that young men did when they went to see their sweethearts. I often met boys of my age who had sweethearts and would eagerly display their love letters, pictures and tokens to me, asking me at the same way I did not find some one like them with whom I might correspond. An inexplicable feeling of delicacy held my tongue, but when they asked my opinion about their lady loves I would shrug my shoulders and characterize them as ugly Dulcis.

One day I went home some months of age who were very pretty little girls. The eldest was but you fifteen. We were holding at a skyscraper, when suddenly the youngest got about to cry, and I was at a loss to relief of my hand. Turning as she as a pretty she whispered in my ear, "Take this."

At the same time I felt something soft and cool in my hand and saw that it was a rosebud with green leaves. The little girl wound of running, but looking back in the out of the corner of her eye. With a very mischievous smile to the elastic she was lost in turn. "Take this" as the same time showing the rosebud in her hand. In consequence of this slight she would not look at me again, and spent the whole afternoon weeping. From now, though she is married and has three children, she has not forgiven me.

As the time which I found to look at this miniature seemed far too short, I resolved to keep it in my pocket. Thus all day long I went around, hiding myself from people as though I had committed a theft. I fancied that the picture, dim up in the case, could see all of my movements. If I felt the scrutinizing eye of it, or had to do aught or speaking or do anything not consisting with the remote delicacy of my ideal love, I would take out the miniature first, deposit it in a safe place and would then feel free to do whatever I wanted to.

In fact, after I had stolen it I was little troubled with pangs. I would hide it under my pillow at night and would go to sleep ready to defend it. I would turn the pictures to the wall, and would myself, five minutes awakening sometimes three times the night with a wild fear in my heart that somebody might snatch my treasure from me. At last I took it out from under my pillow and slipped it in my bosom, and on the following day the imprints of the engraved frame could still be seen on my flesh.

The contact of that cherished miniature produced the most delightful dreams. The fair dame, not her of day, but her own dear self, would come to me and use to carry me off in a chariot to her palace. With a sweet, commanding air she would bid me be on a cushion at her feet, and would pass her fair hand caressingly over my hair and my tousled hair. I would read to her on the lyre sound, or would play on the harp, while she would listen to smile and thank me for the pleasure my reading and singing afforded her. In fact, I was in the seventh heaven, completely filled my heart, and I was ready to consecrate either a poem or a troubadour for the sake of my beloved.

With the waking of my disordered fancy I grew thin. My father and my aunt observed my emaciation with great anxiety.

"At this rate," said the former, "the boy will consume everything in his stomach," and my father, who would read medical works, and thus occasionally study the dark caches under our eyes, my pulse, his and, above all, my total lack of appetite.

"He and play, my boy," he would say to me, "while I would answer me, "I don't feel like it."

They began to be very concerned for me and offered to take me to the theatre. They made me try sable my clothes and gave me taking milk to drink fresh from the cow. Then they dragged me to cold shower baths to strengthen my nerves, and I noticed that when my I went to my father's room he had some good morning he would look at me fondly, while he would feel for all over to see whether my muscles were strong. I would lower my eyes, determined to die rather than confess what ailed me.

As soon as I could move myself from my family's watchful care I would hasten off alone aside with my beloved. At last, in order to get rear of her, I took off the cold glass which covered the fairy. I hesitated as I was about to do so, but her was stronger than the reason fear that the desecration caused me.

While I pressed my lips to the painting, and pondered the soft fragrance of the lock of hair, I fancied, even still more than before, that it was a living person over whom my trembling hands passed. It is pity. Overcome by my feelings I sank on the sofa unconscious, pressing the miniature to my heart.

When I came to myself I saw my father, mother and aunt all anxiously bending over me. I recognized and strive were disturbed at my fainting. My father felt my pulse and shook his head while he murmured, "His pulse beats very fretty and seems about to stop."

My aunt with her bedded fingers was trying to get the picture away from me, while I mechanically endeavored to hide and keep it from her.

"But, my lad, let go of it," she exclaimed. "Don't you see that you are spoiling it? I shall have to send for you. Be a good boy and I'll show it to you at some any time as you want to see it, but can't spoil it! Let go of it, I say. Do you see injuring it."

"Let him have it," said my mother, "If the poor child is sick."

"Well, that's real," replied the good old maid. "Let him have it. And who will paint another one like it, pray? Who will ever behold my again as I used to be there? Nobody paints miniatures nowadays. That is all ended, and I am sadly, too, for I am no longer what I used to be."

My aunt was coming from their secrets in amazement. My hands let fall the miniature. I hardly know how I managed to answer, "Yours! Is the miniature yours?"

"Don't look so handsome as that to you, my boy. Ah, Billy, your mother's and dotage in such looks—though I don't remember exactly how I my eyes to be for I have not kept track of time—but anyway, we really can take those years away from us."

My heart fluttered in my breast and I turned again. My father took pity on me and put me in my bed and afterward made me take several spoonfuls of port wine.

I was became convalescent, but my passion for the portrait had disappeared. I never cared to enter my aunt's room again. Translated from the spanish of Emilia Pardo by Rosamond by Mary Hallaran.

"August Flower"

Perhaps you do not believe these statements concerning Green's August Flower. Well, we can't make you. We can't force conviction into your head or medicine into your throat. We don't want to. The money is yours, and the misery is yours, and until you are willing to believe, and spend the one for the relief of the other, they will stay so. John H. Foster, 1122 Brown Street, Philadelphia, says: "My wife is a little Scotch woman, thirty years of age and of naturally delicate disposition. For five or six years past she has been suffering from Dyspepsia. She became so bad at last that she could not sit down to a meal for she had to vomit it as soon as she had eaten it. Two bottles of your August Flower have cured her, after many doctors failed. She can now eat anything and digest it, and as for Dyspepsia, she does not know that she ever had it."
