UNDERGROUND ICE CELLARS.

Some Cellars Advised—Ventilation Necessary—Advice on the Floor.

An interesting and valuable paper on the subject of ice underground is that of the practical agricultural, Mr. G. M. Doolittle, as edited by himself in The Beekeepers' Review. Into a hole or rise of ground facing the east and rising at the rate of about four inches to the foot he dug about thirty feet on that the back end of the hole was about ten feet deep, measuring straight up to the west bank. This same hole was about nine feet wide, and for a time it was boarded up at first, a roof put over and then fed of earth put on top of the roof. Herein he ventured his honey successfully, thus proving the value of such a place for wintering bees. Concerning his further proceedings in this line Mr. Doolittle says:

When the boards became rotten I took all down and put in a good wall of stone and mortar, on top of which I put a good strong roof, which was covered with three feet of dry earth, and over the whole was large sod, so as to keep the earth and all under it dry. Some then the "strong roof" rotted out, and I now have the cellar covered with flagstones, so that the whole is a permanent affair. The first one or cellar did not have the entire roof, consequently the first was damp and by mice and moles. I find the latter much better, as the dry earth seems to keep a more even temperature than did the first one.

The cellar is built as 24 feet from the west end here is the entrance door, so that the cave is in reality only 24 feet long (or 8) wide by 7 feet deep, inside measure. The first and the entrance door is another door, and still two feet further out is another door, and in front of this door there are two feet square, which has a door to that, so I have to pass four doors every time I go into the cellar. As these doors all fit nicely, I have three large dead air spaces through which the cold air must pass to get into the cellar, and yet the first mentioned door is the coldest part of the cave or cellar, as is readily shown by the moisture collecting in drops upon it. After the bees are put in here all is shut tight and left so till spring after the bees are out out.

Before remodeling the cellar the last time I put in a suitable ventilator to feed long and cause a hot dead air, also a ventilator at the top both of which could be controlled at pleasure. From much manipulation of these through a term of years I finally left them shut all the while, and as the bees did better with them shut, and as the temperature could be better controlled with them shut, they were left out entirely in the last two seasons, and I would not have them back again to any amount. As to one point did I err go with more caution or more "fear and trembling" than on this ventilation matter, as that are one could tell me that I jumped at conclusions in putting in the first one. I felt a properly constructed, wholly underground bee-cellar made so that ventilation then will naturally come through walls of moist earth and the earth.

Mr. Doolittle states that he would not have the floor of the bee cellar concreted, but he adds "There are bees dying of old age all the while in my cellars, and where many colonies are wintered in any cellar there old bees coming out on the cellar bottom to die, as they always do with the above temperature, make the bottom of the cellar very unpleasant to walk on. Besides the foul smell from decaying bees is very offensive to me, whether others feel the same or not. To overcome this I usually scatter a two bushelfull of sawdust over the floor every month, which not only keeps down all offensive smell but prevents crushing the dead bees so that they can be taken up and the sawdust thrown off by the horses will, since using the sawdust as above I can say that I am perfectly satisfied with my cellar."

Earth Stable Floors.

Dr. William Horne, V. S., writing to Western Agriculturist, says: "Taking everything into consideration, the cobblestone or the brick floors are the best. Nearly all the floors of the best stables in Europe are of cobblestone, brick or some other similar material. All the fancy stables nearly are cobbled. There may be situations which favor earth floors—a stable on a side hill is such a place—but generally Dr. Horne denounces earth floors."
