MARRIED AT SEVENTY-THREE.

GUS HERVES, THE GREAT TENOR WEDS A YOUNG WOMAN.

A voice from the past. That is an old phrase, but it is peculiarly applicable to the reappearance of J. Blake Reeves in the newspaper after half a dozen years of practical oblivion. The greatest English tenor since the days of Braham, he had fain to submit to the fate of all his class. Even before his farewell appearance of May 11, 1891, his voice showed pars, its sweet ness quality, so marvelous in compass, and yielded before the coming of age. It was then a memory, but an admirable fact. And the memory survived only among that small class who are students in musical history, who are interested in the past rather than the present.

And now at the age of 73 Blake Reeves's name once more comes into serious notice before the world. But it is not in his historical capacity as a singer. It is in the more fulfillment of his manhood duties of a blushing bridegroom. The octogenarian will wed one maiden to himself a second wife, who is described as young and handsome. And the world that has always loved a lover pays not the tribute of appropriate admiration to one who has conquered in the lists of Cupid even after he has retired from the battleground of Thalia.

After his farewell to the operatic stage in 1891, where he had won so many great successes, the great singer became popular all over the country as a ballad singer at concerts. In 1893 he celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of his appearance on the stage, an almost unprecedented feat in musical annals, and made the occasion historical in his autobiographic volume, "My Golden Performance," published in the same year.

For men were mute gaslit and appreciable than Blake Reeves at the height of his prosperity. He was one of the favorite members of the Garrick club when Thackeray, Jerrold, Tulfourd and Sergeant Murphy haunted the old smoking room. But with the advance of age he forswore late hours and retired to the pleasant home he had built for himself at Beulah Hill, in Norwood, where he is surrounded with the memories of his splendid past. At 73 he is as hale and active as when he first trod the boards of La Scala.—New York Herald.
