FRANKLIN D. RICHARDS,
JOSEPH F. SMITH.

THE CONFERENCE.

The Sixty-sixth Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, has closed, has been a memorable one. Vast multitudes have been gathered from all parts of the State to enjoy the fellowship of one another, to worship the eternal Father and to receive instructions and other spiritual gifts and blessings. During the meetings the power of God rested on the speakers and the congregations, and the result cannot fail to be a firmer determination to serve God, a closer unity and more perfect harmony in the faith and renewed hope for the vitality of the truth as revealed to the Gospel of our Lord.

Precious teachings were given on many important subjects, two of which were especially prominent, one referring to the duty of the Saints to send the Gospel to the nations of the earth, and the other to the necessity of subordinating the ordinary affairs of life to the service of the Lord. The two are so closely related as to be inseparable.

The mission of the Church in this world is to proclaim the eternal truth as revealed from heaven; to declare salvation to the uttermost ends of the earth. The officers and members engaged in the work are—to use the language of an ancient Apostle—ambassadors of Christ, charged with the duty of bringing about reconciliation between earth and heaven. Every gift bestowed upon the Church, every organization within its boundaries, all the various experiences through which it has passed, are for the purpose of making its members capable of performing this high and holy calling, not only by way of proclaiming the truth theoretically, but by exhibiting it practically in all the affairs of life. The world at present needs a righteous people just as much as it did when ancient Israel was chosen to exemplify among the nations the principles of heaven in their national life to the land of promise. The Saints have been charged with the responsibility of building the connecting bridge between an era that is rapidly passing away and a new one, in which the human family shall attain to higher perfection than ever before in its history. The work of the Church is truly marvelous among the children of men.

It is evident that for the accomplishment of this work no less power is needed than that which followed the servants of heaven in former ages. To the little group of Nazarenes in the city of Jerusalem that faced the world in the beginning of the present era it was intimated that they should remain together, until they were endowed from on high, and it was also emphatically taught that in their unity of purpose—that unity which is a natural fruit of brotherly love, they should be made strong in their work. The influence of God's Spirit always was to preserve that harmony, while the efforts of the opposing power were put forth to destroy it. Much of the struggle during the early apostolic days was for the preservation of unity in faith and practice, and it is impossible to read the teachings of God in this age without noticing that the divine Spirit is also striving to preserve that indispensable factor in the missionary work of the Church, for the good of the world.

It need hardly be said that the greatest privilege bestowed upon any man or woman is a responsible position in that of having access to the counsel of those who are endowed with more experience and greater wisdom than he or her own. Nor does it need any argument to prove that without this privilege unity is impossible. What is an army without officers? A ship without a pilot? A family without a head? A church in which each individual has no more reliable authority, neither in heaven nor on earth, than his own wisdom and more of less extent light is an anomaly, and he who double this will find abundant proof on the pages of ancient and modern history. Where therefore the great work of the Church is concerned, and its conditions necessary for its accomplishment understood, the teachings of the last Conference will be robust in stating the most precious ever received through the inspired servants of the Lord.

Of course, those who ever watch with eagerness every word spoken by the leaders of the Church, and others who fail to comprehend the nature of the work to which those leaders have devoted their lives, and who always seek to discover something suitable to their own purposes of opposition, will raise an outcry to such principles, no matter if their perfect soundness can be demonstrated by the highest authority recognized among all Christians. But this last need cause no uneasiness, no alarm. The Saints who are faithful and willing to carry out the instructions given, will know, as they go along, that they are on the safe side, and the last will attempt to persistently cheat to act.

THE REPUBLICAN CONVENTION.

The first Republican convention of the State of Utah is now a matter of history. It was largely attended, there being 522 delegates in attendance, besides several alternates and as many spectators as could find places in the not too commodious building. It was as typical a political gathering as could well be conceived of, not one element necessary to the start, progress or finish being absent; from the florid "gush" in the cut-at-clothes platitudes, from the sentorian tones of the outdoor orators to the feebleness utterances of the slip-tongued "spreader," from the words of worldly wisdom to the desperate attempts at homestead humor, and from the silence of suspense (very rare) to the Eustynic confusion of many voices vocally blended—it was all there, every bit of it, and more too.

The permanent chairman, ex-Governor Thomas, while quite equal to the occasion as a parliamentarian, lacks the sternness and force necessary to cope with so large an aggregation of men or less mixed elements, each with a favorite scheme "up his sleeve" and a lot of enthusiasm to unsnik and let go when the time comes; so to the onlooker it seemed at times as though the convention had the bit in its teeth and was running away down hill with the traces off; but with the aid of the gavel—which implement never performed more neatly unceasing or more effective service—order came forth again from the realms of chaos and enough business could be transacted to get up a fresh supply of explosives ready to be touched off at the slightest suggestion. It was truly a republican convention.

Jesting apart, the manner in which the State Republicans at their first gathering disposed of the cuisine in hand must be something of a surprise to themselves when they look back upon it. It contained less time than any similar gathering ever held in Utah, and had some momentous issues to deal with. We are all familiar with the disputed question of whether silver or the tariff should receive equal recognition or one to give prominence at the expense of the other. With such diversity of opinion and the champions of either phase so earnest and determined, it is easy to understand how the formation of a resolutions committee, the compilation of its work and the disposition of that work by the convention might be made to occupy twice or three times as much time as was taken up altogether; but it was rested off with tolerable coolness and dispatch, and before five o'clock the meeting had dissolved. This was regard in the double light of a highly creditable performance and an example worthy of imitation.

The delegates chosen, like the declaration of principles, are men who are a whole firing forward and uphold all the cardinal principles of national Republicanism without slighting or overlooking the great issue to which any of the Western most strongly committed. In choosing them geographical lines were ignored, but we hardly think this will be the cause of much ill feeling. They are men of prominence not only here but elsewhere, stand high in the community generally and have recognizably left to their chosen callings and in the political field. In order to insure unanimity, all in attendance were, it is the convention could have been more generally satisfactory to the delegations of Utah. It is not remarked, it occurred a week instead of a very short day.

BEYOND OUR SIGHT.

A statesman of the White House once President Cleveland, has become very fond of whistling, and—as the morning papers say—whistles "Yankee Doodle." Among the good, as all statesmen know, "Yankee Doodle" is the greatest tune in Congress, Democratic.

The President is now in years and, and while he may be—while grey there should be no discouragement to, on the reason that many men are years and some even twenty years younger than he have become not only grizzled and gray but quite white-headed. There is a terribly large number of men all over all parts of the world who are over 100 years old and yet are apparently vigorous, and the number of those who are older than Mr. Cleveland and as "sound as a dollar" is not only beyond computation by reason of its vastness, but includes more names of eminent men than are found in the class beneath him in years. Man's experience as a rule is merge and his judgment immature in some measure before attaining the age of 60, and while his physical powers may and usually do decline more or less by or before that time, if he has lived a reasonably regular and laterally temperate life, he will enjoy a more nearly balanced intellectuality and have greater reasoning power by reason of the passage of the three score years. Men like Gladstone, Gladstone and many never to me after the truth of these statements; they are more than octogenarians and are not only as sound in mind and vigorous in expression as at any time during their lives, but are physically well preserved and reasonably strong. The idea which has obtained in some circles that a man who has reached the half century mark is old, grows out of the overtones of the past at which those who entertain such idea are living more than anything else and from that standpoint is eminently correct the more rapid the gait, the sooner the walk is over. An individual who has not lived so as should be at the zenith of his physical prime between his fiftieth and sixtieth years and of his mental prime for at least twenty years later, with the reasonable hope of being able to celebrate the century mark in his life's career.

At the same time we are glad to learn that the President can and does whistle. While sometimes a source of genuine annoyance to others, there is no doubt that a habitual whistler is in possession of a light heart and an easy conscience. To be an accomplished "performer" on this natural instrument is to be able to drive dull care away and to be a sort of consolation ably under a most any circumstances.

AN ERRORY English physicist, Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson, some time ago expressed his views on the subject of longevity, and indicated now, according to his opinion, men and women should live in order to reach the age of a hundred years. The British Medical Journal of November 30, last year, contained an abstract of the statement made by the doctor to a reporter. According to this, anyone desiring to become a centenarian must never smoke and never drink intoxicants. He should eat very little meat. He must avoid working by artificial light, and as much as possible "make the sun his fellow workman." The doctor says nothing about going back a couple of centuries to secure a sound and vigorous ancestry.

NUMBER ONE, volume one, of the Morgan Mirror is on our table. It is a regular newspaper, the first issue of a weekly publication begun at the county seat of Morgan county. The Mirror announces its independence in politics, and its determination to print the news. We wish this additional evidence of progress in the beautiful mountain town all the success its energy and enterprise deserve.

Two Extra Cures.

Mrs. Florence Thomas, of Junction City, Ills., was told by her doctors she had Consumption and that there was no hope for her, but two bottles of Dr. King's New Discovery completely cured her and she says it saved her life. Mr. Thos. Eggers, 139 Florida St., San Francisco, suffered from a troublesome and agonizing Consumption, tried without result everything else; then bought one bottle of Dr. King's New Discovery and in two weeks was cured. He is naturally thankful. It is such results, of which these are samples, that prove the wonderful efficacy of this marvelous medicine. Free trial bottles at Z. C. M. I. Drug Dept.
