LONGING FOR THE MESSIAH.

To those who believe in the second coming of the Son of Man to this earth, it must be interesting to know that not only among professed Christians but also among Mohammedans there is at present a strong belief in the coming of a Messiah, and deliverance, through Him, from bondage. In one of the magazines there is an article on this subject—the substance of an interview with a prominent Persian, in which he explains briefly the principles of the Persian sect, the Bahists.

These, he explains, are identical with Mahdists. Mahdism is the doctrine of the Mohammedan Messiah. It is taught coolly and is never imparted to outsiders, owing to certain initiatory formalities which the "profane" would be sure to ridicule. But as the doctrine of a Messiah was the bright star of hope to ancient Israel during the persecutions and oppression of that nation, so it is the hope now of the Mussulmans of the oriental countries. And owing to many circumstances this Mesiasic, or Mahdist, belief is now so deeply rooted in all Mohammedan nations—especially the Schiites—that it has become their life and soul. If the oppressed hordes in Persia, Turkey, Morocco, have endured patiently so many bad governments, it is because they are sure that a Mahdi will soon arise to remedy all these evils. They are crying out, like the Jews, for a savior and a deliverer.

Tradition declares that Friday is the day on which he will reveal himself to the world, and accordingly every Friday, in all the mosques, prayers are offered up and invocations are made beseeching Allah to hasten the time of Messiah's advent. All Mussulman sects also invariably at the realization of this Mesiasic doctrine. All the different Mahdis, past and present, those of the Soudan as well as all the others, are but the expression, more or less incomplete, of this central doctrine of a Mesiasic deliverer.

According to tradition, the true Mahdi will be preceded by sixty forerunners called Bab—Door—and the Persian sect derives its name from this word. They believe in the establishment of a new and universal religion in which modern progress is accorded a place by the side of Islamic precepts, and the movement is said to shake the old Persian regime to its foundation. It is thought probable that from Persia it will spread throughout the entire Mohammedan world.

THE ACT OF SUICIDE.

Among the more heinous crimes which mark the present condition of society as unsatisfactory to this country, that of self murder keeps well up in the statistics. The act of suicide is, according to the recorded reasons thereto, chiefly the outcome of a desire to escape from conditions which the individual has been thrown into by crime either on part of himself or some other person. Much the smaller percentage is of the class where there is no apparently strong reason and where the "epidemic" of suicide or insanity, temporary or otherwise, can be unexplicable as a cause. The greater share of the occurrences is the outgrowth of crimes whereby personal honor has become involved.

This method of supposedly escaping through death, self-inflicted, from woes that press hard and fast upon the mind is growing more popular with each generation, judging by the statistics which are compiled of this class of events; and it implies that there is no idea that by shuffling off mortality the trouble and worry will be also cast aside. To an intelligent individual there never was a worse error. All who recognize life hereafter, no matter in what state they may view it as existing, must recognize that the intelligence of the individual continues as an entity; that the body is that portion which is subject to the unconsciousness called death. They also must recognize that while in this life the body is the lodging place of many pains and ills, yet above all these are the worry, the uncertainty, the sorrow and pain of the intelligent organism which possesses the body and which are the very things that most of the suicides would escape from. Even with these, then, a moment of thought is sufficient to discover that while they escape the lesser bodily ills yet the greater mental agonies continue, augmented by the farther fact of the great crime through which escape was sought and not found.

From the rational standpoint of continued existence, therefore, there is scarcely thing as escape from it by way of suicide. The adoption of that method of departure from mortality only greatly magnifies the burden of the sorrow, and reduce it immensely upon the individual. All other crimes less than murder may be in a degree recompensed by good works from the burdens thereof be obtained in fair measure at home, by continuing to live out never by plunging into death. When once the latter course is adopted, the entire capital which might have been used in liquidating the debt is swept out of existence, and there is incurred a penalty that cannot be obliated. If the world-to-order's was thinks to escape in taking death could not realize this he would surely see and this in most instances upon the contemplation of the awful deed. The reflection that responsibility and sorrow and at death is responsible for many lives going out at an untimely time.

From a religious point of view, even more strongly than from the standpoint of philosophy, the crime of suicide is abhorred. The individual who would hurl back at the Creator the divine boon of a tabernacle of flesh and bones, whether of himself or of another, is a murderer in the sight of God. Whether it be the taking of himself or of another, the act is the same. The divine law is condemnatory to the utermost of the destroyer of human life. "A murderer hath not eternal life abiding in him." And there is no distinction in the crime because the victim may be self instead of another.

The Latter-day Saints look upon suicide with the utmost degree of abhorrence; to them self-murder and the murder of another are in the same category. The report of suicide is beyond the pale of that which is permissible under any circumstances whatever. There is no commencement thereof any more than for taking the life of another. Both are one or nine—the highest against the law of nature and of God.

DOUBLE CONSCIOUSNESS.

The Medical Record relates the strange experience of a man who had lost all memory of his previous life. There was brought into the Philadelphia hospital on March 3rd of the present year, the paper says, an individual who was found on the streets and maintained that he did not know his name or the circumstances that led up to his admission, or to fact have any memory of events prior to that date. In his possession was found a pawn ticket bearing the name of Brandt, and by this name he was registered. After some days of observation it was found that the man presented no evidences whatever of organic disease and he was put at clerical work, which he performed with readiness and ability. He was exhibited at the meeting of the American Neurological association in Philadelphia in June last. When a new set of resident physicians went on duty at the hospital early in July, one of their number recognized the new clerk as a former schoolmate but the recognition was not mutual. The identity of the man was verified by a photograph in the possession of the resident physician and was subsequently confirmed by other acquaintances, as well as relatives of the patient. The man maintains that he has no definite recollection of anything that transpired prior to March 3rd, although he admits that he has a vague notion of having traveled abroad.

The Record suggests that this looks like an instance of "double consciousness" or "dual personality," but fails to explain the meaning of these terms. Is it among medical authorities recognized as a possibility that two personalities can dwell in the same human form and alternately use its organs, or that one personality may drive another out and take possession of the vacated body? To laymen some further explanation would be extremely interesting. The Jekyll and Hyde arrangement has always been looked upon as the bold invention of a beautiful author instead of something founded in fact.

MORMONS IN KENTUCKY.

We have received a copy of the Vanceburg, Kentucky, Sun, which contains a report of the recent conference held there by the Latter-day Saints in the West Virginia conference, which embraces part of Kentucky. The Sun's report is given in an honest, impartial spirit, and displays powerful Kentucky liberality and hospitality. In its comments on the meetings it says that the opinion of the public is that "the name of the so-called Mormons" is vindicated in that section by the obedience and conduct with which Mormon disciples were placed before the people.

At the conference referred to there were present Elder Elias S. Kimball, president of the Southern States mission, Elder W. E. Hydrick, president of and some thirty-two traveling Elders in the West Virginia conference. The Sun says a fair contingent, mostly from the country, greeted the Elders at the singing exercises which were the singing of scriptural hymns and four of as good sermons as will be heard in any church, the doctrines of which were similar to the Christian (Campbellite) church. This service was all that was needed to convince the deluded mind its error in condemning this people, who are nothing more nor nothing less than purely born and bred American citizens, of advocating a doctrine and cause which was impossible and in direct opposition to the laws of the land as well as the Bible." The Sun also says there was not at that time or at any time since anything brought out that would sustain the unjust accusation a prejudiced public has made against them. Rather than this, it continues, "we hear them tell of their trials, of leaving their homes, their families, their all in charge to this world, without any compensation whatever, was enough to enlist the sympathy of the most skeptical; to hear them tell of their sentiments while traveling, a strange people in a strange land, and then to consider their meek, gentle manner and humble submissiveness to authority, was enough to win over an ingratiating public, was enough to win for them the strongest friendship a broad minded person could be capable of entertaining." A very complimentary reference is made to Elders Kimball and Hydrick, and the Sun concludes:

The meeting taken all in all was very interesting and also awakened considerable interest among our people. We feel that from the manner in which they have expressed and conducted themselves while here and in the over seven thousand miles our guests, some eight months ago, that they are chosen in their calling and are worthy to be great men. We bespeak for them the kindly offices due them as to due every free-born American citizen from another no matter what their belief.

The energy the missionaries display in presenting their views before all classes of society is yielding most satisfactory results in the way of informing the public of the actual condition and aims of the Latter-day Saints. For years the core have been closely barred against them in many places, but the power of the Lord has wrought a change in this respect, and has opened the way for the Gospel message to reach the people generally. With the opening of this broader field the magnitude of the work before the servants of the Lord in latter days opens up more fully to the minds of Israel, whose yeoman aid especially should be required with renewed audibles to carry the glad message of salvation to the world. The hand of the Almighty is clearly manifest in the working of His purposes for the spread of the Gospel, and those who would be honored instruments in His hands in the great work should not be longer behind in taking upon them the duties connected therewith.

A DAY AND WORK ALWAYS.

The noted evangelist, D. L. Moody, interested an audience last Sabbath that he regarded it a proper time for religious people in this country to pray for the nation to be saved from impending peril, and he had his whole congregation engage in prayer. The idea is a very proper one that religious people should pray for the country's welfare. They should do it at all times, not neglecting the devotional exercises until they behold a threatening danger. Deliverance from evil is not only an individual but a national need; and prayer therefor should go up from the lips and hearts of religious people in all the land. It should be in times of peace as well as in days of turmoil. And unmixed with it should be water in harmony therewith. The man who prays vehemently for the peace and preservation of the nation and is found shouting with or encouraging disorderly mobs had better not pray in the way indicated, that at least he might be consistent. But if all the religious people of this country were to pray always and work always for the nation's good, the future of the Republic would be full of brightness and joy.

WHAT DID IT COUNT FOR?

The plan of fusion in Idaho in which Democrats and Populists excluded silver Republicans is said to be creating some success especially among the fusionists, who, having intended to vote for the presidential candidate of the first mentioned party, had favored heretofore that they were going to receive some recognition in return. This success is said, by a dispatch from Washington, to be worrying leading men in the national party which puts forth a silver presidential candidate, because of the presumed effect which will ensue, especially in neighboring states.

There may be something in this for the friends of silver to think over, at least in order that divisions of an injurious nature may be avoided as far as possible. In the case of Idaho, the leading part in breaking away from the St. Louis convention was taken by Senator Fred T. Dubois. Mr. Dubois has made quite a mark in the national legislature as senator from Idaho. By his tact, ability and courage he gave to the new state a prominence in the Senate that new states were not in the habit of enjoying; he broke through the ancient rule that new men are should be in a measure dumb during the early period of their term in the Senate, and in other ways he came to the front. When the free silver movement at St. Louis, it was in the hands of Senator Teller, Dubois, Conners and a few others to allow what ever direction there was on the subject to show over to the most commonplace fashion. Instead of this, Mr. Dubois in common with the companions who made the bolt there, took the boldest stand possible, just as he had done in the Senate when his voice and vote were for the silver cause in preference to all others. For that cause he threw aside party and all consideration associated therewith; and it was hoped by some of his political faith in other matters who followed his leadership in the silver cause, that there would be some consideration shown him and them by other parties who assumed to put forth the mantle of silver as the immediate bone, and wanted to combine on that platform. Now these people, not only in Idaho but outside of it, are asking, if the course followed by Senator Dubois was sensible, manly, patriotic and right, and in the interest of the people, then in the light of himself and following, being ignored in his own state, what use all his work cost for? If, in places where a union is assumed to be made, the leaders will stand the brunt of the outpost and get yet bad by the silver cause, or be trampled out at night, what may be looked for ahead?

Before we regard the situation presented, the NEWS expresses no opinion and offers no suggestion further than to remark that a house divided against itself, whether it be a house of silver or a house of gold, is in danger of collapse. The feels and sentiments related to are cited here as matters of current history that may have a more or less important bearing on one of the most interesting political contests this country ever saw witnessed.

TWO TRAGEDIES.

Saturday afternoon, in the great city of New York, where many of the working classes have to seek homes as best the clouds as many-storied tenements can reach, two-year-old Maurice Hopper was playing in the presence of his father and mother, on their fifth-floor flat. "Be careful, dear," was the father's admonition to the little one as he attempted to lift the lid of a planking that covered the ladder-hole in the fire-escape. The child stopped and it quiet turned to speak to his wife. There was a baby's scream, and the mother sprang forward, and would have jumped out of the window if the father had not caught her. The baby had fallen through the fire-escape and lay in the area, dead, with his golden hair spread out on the stones.

In another house near by, on the fifth floor, the same afternoon, played little Rosie Conners, two years old. She went to the fire-escape to "dat hole," as the baby lips lisped to her mother close by. One misstep, and she was gone. Her mother rushed down to the cellar, where lay the body of the little one whose life had been dashed out by the fall.

These tragedies of Saturday afternoon were but two of many that have occurred in such places. The grief they brought to loving parents and children was as great as though the babes had been snatched from life by the hand of the assassin; yet the murderous system of construction of fire escapes in tenement houses of great cities is unchanged, and uncondemned by the law that should protect life as well from one form of unnecessary danger as another.

WATER VS. STEAM.

There was a time when water power was considered almost a thing of the past in its adaptation as a motive force to machinery; but the recent progress of electrical engineering has placed a new face on the situation. Here in Utah we are realizing the potency of water power in being a cheaper agent than steam engines for the production of electricity, and Salt Lake city is being lighted and power is being furnished to machinery at prices which the steam generators cannot compete with. In this particular field only a beginning is being made on the Pacific coast; and another step may be noted in the announcement, made from California late week, that the Blue Lakes water supply was being utilized there, and was capable of developing almost as much electrical energy as Niagara Falls.

Referring to the last named place, the Buffalo, N. Y., Express contains the information that the price of Niagara Falls water power, transmitted into electrical energy and delivered to customers in Buffalo, is to be only $25 per horse power for a year—that is, about ten cents per day. A comparison of this figure with the cost of keeping a steam engine gives startling results, showing at once the utter impossibility of successful competition by steam users with those having access to the cheaper power, unless there are local conditions which make the cost of power a secondary consideration. Leaving out of view the difference in the first cost of machinery (which is vastly in favor of the less powerful electric motor), the cost of running a forty horse-power steam engine, for instance, is given at at least $2 per day, against only 24 per day for power supplied on the Niagara Falls and Buffalo plan. And with the latter, all belts, shafts and counter-shafts are dispensed with, if desired, and the power applied to each machine independently, so that it can be used only for one purpose, if necessary. Forty horse-power thus used accomplishes more actual revolutionizing work than forty horse-power from steam (which most always be "kept up"), through the medium of shafts, counter-shafts and belts.

This is a showing which should make manufacturers in the vicinity of other powers turn their attention there as a cheap and ready source of motive force. The comparatively low cost of transmitting water power into electrical energy and the ease with which the same can be delivered to almost any desired spot is shown to be not more than half the cost of production of steam; hence in water-power localities steam engines seem to be decided disadvantage. With the facts in view as they are being developed nowadays, it should not be long in this state before every mountain stream affording any considerable water power in the vicinity of a town or settlement should be utilized for the convenience and comfort of the inhabitants of the locality.

RECENT DISCOVERIES among the ruined cities of ancient Babylonia are said to carry the history of that people back to at least 7,000 years before our era. What the existence of this high degree of civilization at that period will seem but natural to suppose that an energy founded on the ancient records of any nation, living or extinct, must at least be equally difficult of construction to that founded on the dates in the earliest records of the Hebrews. Conclusions drawn in the interest of higher criticism should therefore be willing to submit to higher criticism.

MANY PEOPLE who go to church on Sunday to hear Bible doctrines preached would find it to their spiritual advantage to do systematic Bible reading at home during the week, to have themselves in shape for Sabbath worship.

THE MAN who lays around all Sunday on cushions is not keeping holy the Sabbath day. Cleanliness is next to godliness on Sunday as on other days.

POLITICS MAY not be much of a factor to some people, or it may be. In either event it is a good thing to rest from on the Sabbath day.

THE CITY of New York has made another failure in its effort to dispose of gold bonds. The money-lending fever is not high now.

A GREAT MANY persons who long for health would find more of it if they learned to watch the sun rise these beautiful mornings.
