WARNING TO JEALOUS WIVES.

(CONCLUDED.)
The behavior of the domino was so amiable and gentlemanly that Charlotte submitted to his decided power of his "domino," and believed him to be a true gentleman. They spoke of the uproar at the theatre. He was all indignation. In his anger he consumed truffles, fowls, baked fowls and vegetables—in short, the best the bill of fare offered—and this he washed down with a bottle of champagne. The poor Countess tasted the viands not to seem unthankful. He finished his repast in half an hour.
"How do you feel, madam?" inquired he.

"I am better, thank you."
"Very well, I will order a carriage."

"How can I ever thank you, my dear sir?"

"By refusing to believe that I have placed you under the slightest obligation; any gentleman would have done the same in like circumstances."

"Oh, then, crown your magnanimous conduct by getting me a carriage instantaneously."

"By the time you take a cup of tea I will be back. Waiter, a cup of tea, with cake."

The domino laid down his napkin and hastily left the room. Charlotte waited ten, twenty minutes—a half hour—he did not return. Other masks came in and called for refreshments. The fear that her husband might return home before her, decided the Countess to wait no longer.

"The stranger cannot find a hack," she thought, "he will forgive me if we meet again."

She wrapped herself in her domino, preparatory to leaving. The waiter immediately came towards her.

"My friend," whispered she, "if the gentleman in the domino returns! please say to him that I beg his pardon for my abrupt departure."

"Consider it done, madame, but please settle with me before you leave."

The Countess was shocked; she remembered she had no money with her.

Hermine had undertaken the whole of the arrangements.

"Here is the bill," continued the waiter, "as the gentleman went out he referred me to you."

"To me?"

"My wife will attend to it, he said to me."

If the lower part of her face had not been hidden by her mask the waiter would have seen how the blush of shame tinted her cheeks, as she found she had fallen into the hands of an adventurer, who had gotten a most elegant supper at her expense. The bill was 65 francs. The room was rapidly filling with masks. The waiter eyed her very suspiciously.

"Take this, take this," said she, as with trembling fingers she unclosed one of her bracelets. "To-morrow morning I will pay the bill and get the bracelet."

Charlotte drew a long breath as she found herself in the open air. A large group of hacks stood before the opera house, in which the gayety was at its height. She entered a carriage and was driven to her door, where the porter paid the driver. Scarcely had she entered her own room when the Count arrived; she knew it was he, by the opening and shutting of certain doors. After all, did she know what he had done? After attending the masked ball? or she had attended the masked ball? or she had attended the ball?

"Early the next morning Hermine came to see after her friend. Charlotte told her adventure, and begged her accomplice (as she did not wish to trust a third person) to go for her bracelet. Hermine took the account and left. An hour she redecorated the room of the expectant Countess.

"Where is my bracelet?"

"The waiter said he wondered to me that the Count had not ordered the supper there last night had about an hour before redeemed his wife's bracelet with 65 francs."

The Countess grew pale—she had lost a bracelet worth 1,500 francs but, as she wished her adventures of the evening to remain unknown, she had to bear her loss in silence.

"These are the fruits of jealousy," cried she.

A few days later she learned that on the same evening the Count had lost 1,000 francs at play in his club.

"That was an expensive night," said Hermine, as the news was related to her.

"I pay it cheerfully," answered Charlotte, "for I know that the handsome pasha was not my husband."

Neither the black domino nor the bracelet were ever heard of again.

BREVITIES.

Three-fourths of all the water of London has been pronounced poisonous by Prof. Franklin.

A little four-year old being asked by his mother if he would not like to have wings and be an angel, replied: "No, ma; I'd rather be a hawk and live on chickens."

Caino woke in the middle of the night and groped everywhere for the box of matches; he shrieked in anger: "Ain't I a fool for not leaving out at least one match to enable me to hunt for the box?"

The birth of a pair of triplets being announced by the Detroit Free Press, the Louisville Courier-Journal observes,

"that is seldom that you find triplets who are ingenious enough to be born in pairs without leaving an odd baby somewhere in the neighborhood."

The raising of sugar beets and the production of sugar are attracting a good deal of attention among the friends of the Amherst Agricultural College, where the experiment has been successfully tried, and it is stated that the best granulated sugar can be produced for never costs a pound from sugar beets, and return a better profit to the producer than most of the crops now cultivated in the Connecticut valley.

Violence over defeats its own ends. When you cannot drive your own ends, persons who will submit to violence.

A gentle smile will kindle wonder and accomplish miracles. There is a secret pride in every human heart that revolts at tyranny. You may order and drive an individual, but you cannot make him respect you. In the domestic circle, especially, kind words and looks are more essential to communal felicity. Children should never be spoken harshly to. It does them no good. If they commit a fault, they should be corrected in a mild but firm manner, and the impression it makes upon them is sure to prove salutary.

It is a false theory that a man has a right to own as much land as he can pay for and to do with it what he pleases. The right to own land is regulated by the Legislature and the Courts. It may be restricted in the majority resolved to it. And whenever the time comes that a few men own the great bulk of the good land in a State, shirking their equal share of taxes, obstructing production, and preventing settlement, the people through their Legislatures have the right, and should exercise it, of seeing such monopolies to sell out their estates. They may do this for the general welfare, and in the name of free government, to which nothing is more threatening than a monopsony of land and aristocracy. It may be done directly by laws limiting the ownership of land in one person or one corporation to a much and no more, or indirectly by a graduated scale of taxation, which shall amount in proportion with the amount of land held.—Sacramento Union.
