LINEN AS A HOME PRODUCTION.

There is one branch of home industry which promises good results if once established, and that is the cultivation of flax and the manufacture of linen. That flax is indiginous to the country is well known. It is met with from the bottom lands to the mountain peaks, and though in some respects the cultivated variety may differ from the native, the former could soon be naturalized and its cultivation become a full success. Indeed many years of experience have shown that the raising of flax is more easy than most would imagine, for when counsel for experiment was given many years ago, patches were cultivated in widely different localities, demonstrating that if such pursuit were systematized and machinery erected to manipulate the raw material it could be produced in abundance.

If in the commencement, toweling could be made in the form of crash only, it would be quite an important item. Then hand towels, tablecloths, grain sacks, tent and wagon covers would follow in progressive order; brown linens for ladies summer wear, heavier goods for gents pants and coats, also similar fabrics to Hollands and brown apron goods for children would be more easy than bleached, but the latter would inevitably come. First, rough shirting, then bleached as "Irish," then sheetings, than which in this climate for summer use nothing could be more pleasant or refreshing; following these would come tickings, ducks, diapers, and the whole line of linen goods.

Many a woman now living in Utah can no doubt recollect when the spinning wheel was regularly acknowledged as a domestic comfort and convenience. Indeed the ancient name of spinster given to unmarried women in England originated in that now distinct practice of preparing previous to marriage the bed, body and table linen. To manufacture this was considered the indispensable duty of the expectant bride, and one who did not so provide was, in good families, considered ineligible for matrimonial honors. Who in our day considers this (one of the fine arts), a prerequisite for desirable alliance? Those sheets and pillow cases laid away in lavender, were the boasted insignia of industry, while the table linen, etc., gave a more easily exhibited recommend for frugal housewifery and prophesied of the good qualities of the presiding deity.

A bed tick or three days would almost stand on edge, so dispervious to a stream of feathers as almost of metal, and almost as enduring; for grandmas could tell us at last how the ancient tick, in the first young baby girl, was never partially worn.

It is pretty well received among the latter-day Saints that their second God should be glad in robes of linen. How pleasant if from our own skill this final investiture could be created, instead of sustaining the looms and spindles of northern Ireland our own machinery could do our own work and thus glorify both the living and the dead.

Here is a wide reach of fabrics and goods for which there is an indefinite demand, to say nothing of many small items such as handkerchiefs, thread, lines, (garden and other), also rope, sled cords, &c., &c., to say nothing of the oil content from the flax seed which we need in abundance for painting purposes, this in turn gives us oil cake which is a really fine feed for all kinds of stock, invaluable to the farmer and almost indispensable in fact.

The cottonizing of flax by which softness is secured, would bring this material into combination with either wool, silk or cotton and so multiply the variety of dress fabrics as to meet either purse or fancy and still further extend home industry. This mixing of linen and wool may have been forbidden in the Jewish economy, but it is probable that the liberty of the gospel would not interfere with a custom now almost universal.

Hemp also, and some grasses which are now used for various industrial purposes would give the larger rope, rough cloth such as gunnies, and help to supply our paper mills, but these are comparatively small in contrast with the great article of flax. If Canada, and a great avenue for labor remains unopened, a great outlet for capital remains unclosed, the longer is growth and manufacture also deferred.

Surely the necessities, the conveniences, the comforts, and the sacred characteristics of the people demand that one of the first products of the self-sustaining era (after the necessities of food) shall be, in connection with woolens and leather, the far-reaching and many sided uses of the staple—flax.
