IN THE APIARY.

Ø The Rabbet Approved and Described by an Ohio Apiarist.

In manipulating frames it is quite an advantage to have them rest on as small a surface as possible. They often become propolised and stick fast to the rabbet on which they rest. This is especially the case in cool weather, and loosening them jars the frames and greatly disturbs the bees. To overcome this trouble, an Ohio apiarist, who has used with an advantage a tin rabbet, describes it for the benefit of others, in a communication to Ohio Farmer:

FRAME WITH TIN RABBET.

Fig. 1 represents frame and hive. A is the top bar of frame; B is the side of hive, and F is the tin rabbet. Fig. 2 represents more clearly the tin rabbet. C is the part the frames rest on, and E and D are the parts to be attached to the hive. C should be about three-eighths of an inch high so as not to pinch any of the bees when the frame is hung on the rabbet. E and D can be of such dimensions as will best suit the rabbet in the hive, which should be as deep as the top bar is thick where it rests on the tin rabbet, plus the depth of the tin rabbet. This will make the top bar of frame level with the hive. The tin rabbet is very cheap and very easily made and will be found quite convenient, and the hive is just as easily made for the tin rabbet as not.

Electricity in Agriculture.

In Electric Power is chronicled the successful experiment of a Danish farmer in the use of electric power for threshing. He has hitherto had an old fashioned threshing machine drawn by horses. Three pairs of horses have worked the machine with about 800 turns per minute, the horses being changed four times per diem. The power is transmitted in this way is, owing to the nature of the machinery, irregular, occasioning considerable loss of time to the workmen employed. By the use of an electric motor to propel the threshing mill this disadvantage is removed. The power is transmitted evenly, stoppages are avoided, the threshing is more speedily effected, and the machine itself is spared considerable wear and tear. A stationary steam or oil engine drives the dynamo, and the current is conducted through cables of suitable length to any given point in or outside the barn where the threshing takes place.

At the farm where the experiment has been tried the force is generated by a six horsepower oil (petroleum) engine. The distance between the oil engine and the threshing mill is about 140 yards. A speed of 1,000 turns of the mill per minute can be attained, and it is clearly demonstrated that the threshing proceeds with very much greater ease and rapidity than formerly. It is especially worthy of notice that the speed does not vary even when the mill is very full. If the threshing mill is moved, of course the electromotor must also be moved. It is therefore placed upon a sort of sledge. Another advantage in the use of electricity in the transmission of working power may be mentioned—viz, that the electric current can, without extra expense, produce two lamps in the barn and the machine house.

Tested Layers.

The hens kept for producing the future stock should be of the best. It is unwise to use eggs for hatching unless such eggs are from certain hens that are known not only to be prolific, but which have shown themselves capable of producing hardy, strong and vigorous offspring. In other words, the breeding hens should be tested. No breeder of animals attempts to raise stock unless he knows the sire and dam of each calf or colt obtained, as improvement can
