CHAPTER I.

DEAD MAN'S CABIN.

Long before old Hahn discovered gold at the foot of the mountain that stands as a monument to perpetuate his name, and before the state of Colorado had been carved out of the territory which was ceded to the United States at the close of the Mexican war, there stood near where the village of Hahn's Peak now stands a lonely cabin. The old [illegible], whose gold-seeking proclivities led him away from the haunts of men until he at last found it in that wilder portion of Colorado, [illegible] across this deserted dwelling when he returned from that wonderful journey which cost him his life.

Amid the eternal silence of the mountains, amid the snows of winter and the flowers of summer this house has stood.

The Christmas Mine.

Written for the "News."

It is not a pleasant thing to be away from home and friends on wintry days; but on that day, when everybody who can makes a feast and gathers all the loved ones around the family hearth, if one happens to be away from home the sacrifice is [illegible] felt.

A physician, however, must never refuse the call of humanity; [illegible] depriving his own family thereby in their chief comfort and pleasure.

A serious accident had happened up at [illegible]. Two miners, young and somewhat reckless, had disobeyed orders in drilling in their drill and the [illegible] already in the rock exploded. The two men were seriously injured.

"Uncle John," as the wealthy owner of the mine was called by all his corps of employes, came to me the day before Christmas and asked if I would go with him up to [illegible] to save the lives of these young men if possible.

"Let me see," I answered somewhat deliberately, "we can get a train back in the morning so as to bring us home for Christmas turkey, can we not?"
