BETTER THAN GOLD.

Better than grandeur, better than gold,
Than rank and titles a thousand fold,
Is a healthy body and a mind at ease
And simple pleasures that always please;
A heart that can feel for another's woe,
With sympathies large enough to extend
All men as brothers is better than gold.

Better than gold is a conscience clear,
Though toiling for bread in a humble sphere,
Dearly treasured with content and health,
Earned by hands and crown of wealth,
Lovely living and lofty thought
Adorn and ennoble a poor man's cot,
For good deeds and honor is nature's plan
Are thus genuine traits of a gentleman.

Better than gold in the sweet repose
Of the sons of toil when the labors close,
Better than gold in the poor man's home,
And the hills that drops on his slumbers deep.
Brows sleeping thoughts on the thorny bed,
Where heavy pillows in aching head.
The lower simple opens desire
A shorter route to the land of dreams.

Better than gold is a cheering word,
That in the realm of books can find
A treasure surpassing diamond one,
And bring with the joys and end of pain.
The man's love and the poor's joy,
The glories of empires passed away;
The world's great dream will this exhibit
And yield a pleasure better than gold.

Better than gold is a peaceful home
Where love and friends congregate come,
The states of love, the source of life,
Hallowed by mother, or sister, or wife
However humble the home may be,
Its good cheer seems to heaven's throne,
The blessings that never were bought or sold
And center there are better than gold.

CLEVER COUNTERFEITERS OF PAPER MONEY WHICH BOTHER THE TREASURY OFFICIALS.

(From the Denver News.)

WASHINGTON, April 25.—The recent circulation of fresh counterfeit paper money, which even Uncle Sam's engravers at the bureau of engraving and printing confess their inability to distinguish from their own work, has called public attention very strongly to a menace to the country's finances that is practically new. Photographic and photochromic processes of late invention have rendered it easy for forgers to reproduce any note or certificate with startling perfection, so far as the designs are concerned. As for the paper to print them upon, the government sells it—the resistfit, of treasury manufacture—at a cheap rate to anyone who wants to buy. If you don't believe it you can easily obtain from the secret service bureau here a full account of the manner in which, not long ago, a skilled operator took a large number of real one dollar bills, washed them in a chemical bath so as to remove every trace of printing, and then used the plates he had then prepared to print on the same paper as many $100 bills, the profit on each being $90. That the counterfeit was effective is sufficiently demonstrated by the fact that in one day he passed four of the $100 notes on one bank, being afraid to have them right over the counter to the receiving teller, who took them without question. There were one or two almost imperceptible defects, which caused them to be detected, but that was because they were engraved by mechanical process. In photography there is no error, and that is the reason why the forger today is in a position, for the first time, to make a treasury note or a certificate on Uncle Sam's own paper that no man, however expert, can tell from a real one. It is for this reason that the chief of the secret service urges, as he has recent, that each denomination of United States paper money shall have a distinctive paper of its own, the imitation of which shall be forbidden by legal enactment. Even thus the safeguard is a very insecure one, and the fact is recognized that the fight against the forgers must be fought from this time on upon more perilous ground than ever hitherto.

ITALIANS ARE EXPERTS.

It is an interesting thing, in view of the present Italian complication, to consider the fact that the Italians in this country, according to the records of the secret service, are so peculiarly addicted to the crime of counterfeiting that in a single year more people of that nationality have been arrested and convicted on this charge than all other nationalities put together. Most of these caught, too, were Sicilians, the tribe to which nearly all of the Italians in Orleans belong, and each longed. Desirable citizens, truly? One feature characteristic of Italian counterfeiting methods is a widespread organization, seldom betrayed by traitors, which renders it possible to issue the same forged money simultaneously from points a great way apart, as Chicago and Orleans, to compel the government detectives much trouble in their efforts to discover the source of supply and track down the producer.

CLEVERLY WORK OF COINS.

The counterfeiting of coins has by no means kept pace of recent years with the improvements which the forgers of paper money have been able to accomplish. Most of them are very cheap and it is only once in a while that a piece of metal appears which certainly difficult to the authorities. Attempts only dangerous coin cut at present is the bogus silver dollar which the secret service is applying its energies to ferreting out. It combines in a most amazingly manner, perhaps the essential elements of "ring," weight and "appearance." On the whole, the counterfeiting of coins would not appear to pay, inasmuch as seven-eighths of the makers of imitation money captured are in the coin business. It must be remembered, however, that the branch of the profession pirates very many veteran whose knowledge and skill are not equal to reproducing cash in paper. The latter is the educated branch. Most counterfeits of gold coins are merely slugs, each $5 piece containing $1 worth of the precious metal or in some such proportion. There is no very remarkable use out at present. There are limitations to the possibilities of coin-forging which it is to be feared will preclude its ever reaching the status of a fine art.

A CURIOUS FRAUD.

America is the birthplace of mechanical genius, par excellence. One can not but admire the New Hampshire gentleman who not long ago devised what he appropriately termed a "needle machine." It was a contrivance much the shape of a lemon squeezer, only that in the places where the halves of the lemon go were set two dies for the obverse and reverse of a $5 gold piece. The inventor made it his business to travel in rural parts and to approach enterprising agricultural men on the subject of his machine. Money comes notoriously slow in farming, and thus it is perhaps that the small rustic capitalist is apt to have an inclination for accumulating cash rapidly by means legitimate or otherwise. Upon this more or less criminal propensity of his the gentlemen, on the other hand, sought the farmers on their rural estates, and his method was to show them how easily $5-gold pieces could be manufactured with his machine and to tempt them into participating in a taste of half-share in the profits. In one side of the squeezer, when closed, was inserted a funnel, into which a copious metal alloy was poured, melted. As soon as it had time to cool the squeezer was opened on its hinge, and lo! there was a $5-piece of gold sure enough—save that it had a silvery color. This, however, was quickly rectified by the Yankee, who dropped a little liquid on it, from a bottle, whereupon it turned a permanent golden hue and was to all appearance everything that a $5 gold piece should be.

Not was this surprising, inasmuch as the coin was actually a five-dollar gold piece, fresh from the United States mint. The secret was all in the machine, which was constructed not to steal Uncle Sam, but to deceive the farmer. The metal metal poured in simply poured into a concealed cavity in the squeezer, while the New Hampshire gentleman, in locking the contrivance cunningly to make the operation, touched a knob which caused a real $5 coin, previously put in, to slide into the sunken hole occupied by the die on one side. Then, when the affair was opened the gold piece appeared as if it had been merely molded. It had previously been rubbed thickly with quicksilver so that it was only necessary to put a drop or two of acid upon it in order to eat off the mercury and expose the gold of the coin. The purpose of the quicksilver was merely to make the newly cast coin the same color of the metal poured in. Of course the enterprising farmer was willing enough to pay $100 or so into so profitable a scheme for turning out $5 gold pieces at infinitum, and the New Hampshire gentleman walked away with the cash. The latter had no use for counterfeiting when he could earn real money so easily.

SOME NOTABLE COUNTERFEITERS.

One of the most remarkable counterfeiters that ever lived—at present in jail, happily—is John Peter McCartney, known as the "King of Kinkerers," who has a record of thirty-five industrious years' employment in the business. This ingenious old scoundrel has figured as a capitalist during that period, providing the money required in nearly every important combination of forgers on this side of the water. At one time he traveled and gave a series of lectures about "How to Detect Counterfeit Money," most of the change he gave at the box office being of his own exclusive manufacture. But the most famous and successful of all forgers known to history are Charles H. Smith and the celebrated Brooks brothers, who have been engaged in this exciting industry ever since boyhood, though both are now old men. Their skill in their chosen occupation has never been equaled up to the present time. For a generation they kept the government authorities in a fret, the climax arriving when they issued the famous $1000 bond, which only an accident prevented them from negotiating to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars with banks in Chicago that declared their willingness to take the securities as genuine even after the agent of these malfactors had been employed with them in his value. But the consciousness that which these men have applied to their profession has been sadly unprofitable on the whole. After a lifetime spent in emulating the best efforts of the treasury department in the engraving line, they were so outwitted a while ago as to be compelled to court mercy by giving up the work of years in the shape of about a car load of plates and dies. In this collection, subsequently destroyed, there were the materials for turning out, at the expense only of potatoes' ink and labor, notes and certificates of every denomination, as well as coins of all sorts and of every metal. The wonderful bond plates have been preserved as curiosities for exhibition in private cabinets. One plate of stone death could not give pair of dies because they had passed out of his possession. They were for a $1000 United States note, which is so perfect as to have been passed repeatedly at banks. Wherever they are they are dangerous, because they may be used again at any time. The secret service would give a great deal to get hold of them. The only flaw in the counterfeit is a slight tear on the end of the note. The person who figures in the central vignette, but that might be rectified.

WORK OF THE SECRET SERVICE.

The main object sought always by the secret service where a counterfeit is concerned, is to obtain possession of the plates or dies. So long as they are in existence, unmolested, they mean danger. Hence, it is customary to extend the utmost leniency of the law to forgers who will give up the perilous property—light sentences, sometimes even pardons. But it is a part of the business of the government detectives to keep continuously every counterfeiter who has been let out of prison, in order to see that he does not continue his criminal career. In most cases the hard criminal has a redeeming institution to return to his old industry, and the United States treasury would be "in" a great many cases if forgery, as now, or formerly, a capital offense. Men who make an occupation of counterfeiting for a long lifetime were unknown in the old days. The difficulties which attend the catching of counterfeiters are much greater than might be surmised offhand. In the first place the men who manufacture the money is not even known to those who circulate it. Usually, he establishes confidential relations with a restaurant keeper for example. The latter is supplied with a stock of bogus bills or coin, which he keeps buried under ground. From the hotel keeper all persons whom mine host has reason to trust buy the "stuff" at an average rate of 50 cents on the dollar. They pass it. If one of them is caught, he may "peach" on the hotel keeper, but his assertion will not furnish convicting evidence against the hotel keeper. Generally the hotel keeper will deny the charge and he must be acquitted unless the bogus money is found on his premises. It is not of no to find because it is extremely hidden before ground somewhere that he only knows of, and to discover it is almost out of the question. Suppose, however, that it is discovered. In that case it does not follow by any means that he will betray the finger, and, if the forger himself is captured it will remain to have the whereabouts of the dies or plates, which the counterfeiter will certainly not keep on his premises. Consequently the finding of it is decidedly surprising that the efforts of the secret service are so successful as they are.

HOW COUNTERFEITERS ARE SOUGHT.

In the frames containing photographs of counterfeiters at the treasury department a number of photos of women counterfeiters. They are rather degraded-looking characters as a rule, and unlike does not appear to have been attempted any effort upon their physiognomies, but the law does very oddly with them. Particularly when they are the wives of forgers, it is considered from the legal point of view, that their assistance in crime has been given "under duress," and the cudgel is to be spared them. The other frames of counterfeiters' photographs shown are filled with portraits singularly unattractive. Such a squalid aspect is characteristic of them throughout that one would be led to imagine that there is really no money in the business of illicit money making. The traits of a prominent crook, who bear a remarkably uniform cast, it reminded the writer of an occasion years ago, when he was granted the privilege of looking over the rogues' gallery at police headquarters in New York City. He had expected some surprise as to how the most skilled intellectual rogues could go about in crowds on a foggy day and arrest with unerring certainty the criminals whom they had never seen, gathering them in for the protection of honest people. But the case showed him, by reference to the photographs, how the face of the scoundrel had a peculiar character and expression of its own, that of the burglar another, and so on, so that the police agent was able to distinguish the debauched member of society offhand without danger of mistake. It was the same way with these counterfeiters; they all bore the Cain mark of their occupation. Finally enough, the Chinese are great and successful coiners. They have a frame to themselves in the sale-room of the secret service bureau.

EXTENT OF THE "INDUSTRY."

Some notion of the prevalence of counterfeiting will be given by the fact that not long ago, on the occasion of the periodical destruction of such stuff accumulated by the secret service bureau, three-quarters of a million dollars in bogus paper money was burned, and at the same time were rendered useless for further service the plates, dies and 1,191 plates of stone, as well as a great quantity of alleged gold, silver, nickle and copper coins, also many presses, milling machines, electrical and chemical-plating batteries and other apparatus.

Happily for the counterfeiters, the future generation does not need a Brooks and a Smith. Who they achieved by patience and skill, photographic processes will perform almost without human aid, with a perfection beyond criticism. It remains for the United States government to determine what measures it shall adopt for protection against the perfect deception which only mechanical fraud can accomplish.

A Shrewd Solicitor.

An advertising solicitor, one of the brightest members of the hustling fraternity to which he belongs, was met on Chestnut street wearing a smile of great breadth and relishing in excellent humor with himself. "I have just left the head of a big Front street firm," said he, "and I have a fair-sized contract to write up. I had prepared myself to meet a big Front street firm, and I had my bottom fairly opened on him by agreeing to everything I said in favor of advertising and enthusiastically attributing to it much more than I would dare to claim for my own business. He was on before me that his firm had no session whatever for advertising, as it was well known from having advertised extensively in the earlier days.

"So," said I, "you think that the advertising which you did in the early days of your business is sufficient to carry you through now?"

"Undoubtedly I do," he replied.

"Well," said I, "will you kindly tell me the name of the candidate for vice president on the Republican ticket also Gen. Harrison?"

"He was struck. He hesitated, stammered a little, and finally replied, 'Well, no, I don't.'

"'Now,' said I, 'do you know of any man who was better advertised at that time?'

"'It fetched him.'—Philadelphia Inquirer.

TRICKS OF POLICE OFFICERS.

Schemes They Work to Escape from Wearing Uniforms in Public.

While at parades the police captains appear to be proud of their stark and spun uniforms, set off with brass buttons and gold lace, it is a curious fact that in ordinary circumstances they seem to be unhappy when they are compelled to appear in them in public. Various reasons may be assigned for this repugnance to wearing the livery of the force.

Perhaps in the streets and in public conveyances it attracts attention to the wearer and makes everyone feel uneasy in regard to him, but the force in general. A chronicler guess is that if, for instance, a police captain is summoned to police headquarters in a hurry, he may, when his business is transacted there, wish to go elsewhere and not be suspicious.

At any rate many officers resorted to to escape uniform wearing in the streets. One of them is to forward the uniform stored to the Central office, then it down stairs on arriving and slip it off when leaving. This succeeds in the main, but patrolmen are often delayed, and at times are undesirable messengers, and between doubtful captains arriving just on time and fearing lest their garments have not arrived, for the rule against appearing before the superintendent, the commissioners or in the trial room in "mufti" unless specially engaged is rigidly enforced.

Another scheme is no ingenious one. The police tailors small near the police headquarters, and the rule was circumvented years ago by having dummy uniform coats handy and of several sizes ready for emergencies, so that a captain is characteristic of them throughout that one would be led to imagine that there is really no money in the business of illicit money making. The traits of a prominent crook, who bear a remarkably uniform cast, it reminded the writer of an occasion years ago, when he was granted the privilege of looking over the rogues' gallery at police headquarters in New York City. He had expected some surprise as to how the most skilled intellectual rogues could go about in crowds on a foggy day and arrest with unerring certainty the criminals whom they had never seen, gathering them in for the protection of honest people. But the case showed him, by reference to the photographs, how the face of the scoundrel had a peculiar character and expression of its own, that of the burglar another, and so on, so that the police agent was able to distinguish the debauched member of society offhand without danger of mistake. It was the same way with these counterfeiters; they all bore the Cain mark of their occupation. Finally enough, the Chinese are great and successful coiners. They have a frame to themselves in the sale-room of the secret service bureau.

A Parrot That Sounded to 5 ish.

I am inclined to fancy that parrots learn and perhaps understand phrases relating to eating and drinking almost sooner than any others. One of my feathered acquaintances was in the habit of inviting visitors to take refreshment. "Won't you have a cup of tea? Do have a cup of tea," she would say, and sometimes it was really awkward, as almost compelling the mistress to extend her hospitality to visitors for whom such an invitation had not previously been intended.

This bird was also fond of saying "Goodby," and never said it at the wrong time. When the visitor was about to depart he or she would be startled by a voice from a presumably lifeless specimen, saying, "Well, good-by, really I'm sorry you go." I do not know that this was the proper thing to say, and that this was the proper time for saying it, I am no judge of parrots.

This bird had been taught to sound up to six, but she could rarely say the numbers all in order. She often missed one—and the same figure, however, three, four or five were (but only once at a time) her usual substitute. She was always conscious that she had made a mistake, and on "skipping" a figure would give a shrill comical whistle and begin again. Some kind of thought and subjection must have passed through her mind during this performance.—Chambers' Journal.
