Children should early learn that the rules governing the behavior of the members of the family to each other are based upon mutual duties. The parents have certain obligations to their children. The children have toward their parents certain duties based on gratitude, on love, on filial respect. Brothers and sisters have mutual duties based on their relationship and natural affection for each other, on a common interest in the family welfare and on proper family pride which even the poorest should feel.

which even the poorest should feel. The family may also contain other relatives; servents may be kept; guests may partake of its hospitality. All of these must get along smoothly together for home loses all claim to that name if crossness is shown, if quarrels are frequent. more easily if politeness constantly lubricate it. Children should never fail to show their mothers and sisters the same courtesy they would show to any other ladies. A boy should early be taught to lift his bat to them in meeting them on the street or in parting com-pany with them. He should rise when they enter the room, and see that they are comfortably seated. He should always allow them to precede him. He should assist them in and out of cars; he ghould carry their par-cels, and escort them when they wish it. In short, he should be chivalrous in his nome life. No boy who is rude to his nearest relatives, or neglectful of them, who is not solicituos for their comfort and pleasure, has a right to be called a gentleman.

BEHAVIOR AT TABLE. In no one thing is good or bad breeding more quickly seen than in one's manners at table. It is espe-cially noticeable, because people are there brought into such close contact with one another. A few hints for ta-ble behavior are given in the hope that they may be suggestive. The bell-bred person will not slt too far from the table, nor too close to it, nor sidewise, nor on the edge of his chair. He will never tilt his chair. He will not finger or play with the knives, spoons, or other articles on the table, nor stick them out in using his knife and fork, nor bend his elhows in eating so as to bring his mouth.
