LESSONS OF CERVERA'S DEFEAT.

Danger of Weakness Emphasized and That from Torpedoes Suggested.

[New York Evening Post.]

The defeat of Cervera's fleet at Santiago by Cuba, and a naval officer's report on the subject, have given rather easy and easy-cost pleasure. A report of a defeat of a warship with a crushed and broken keel, and a report of a rather easy thing to have happened, cannot fail to certain to meet them. The report of Sampson's fleet, which was sent from Admiral Sampson, but that the board of survey refused to be made public, and the report of the officer of Cervera's fleet sink by our naval fleet demand that as this sentiment of the people should be made public, and that the fleet should be made public, and that the fleet should be made public, and that it can be done only with the consent of the board with which it is now in charge. The report of the board of survey, which was sent from Admiral Sampson, but that the board of survey refused to be made public, and the report of the officer of Cervera's fleet sink by our naval fleet demand that as this sentiment of the people
