THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Intelligent, persistent advertising is the recognized means by which all legitimate enterprises are kept afloat and advanced. This applies no more to private business concerns than to corporations and communities which produce anything to sell. It is not to be presumed, because not true, that all the features, capabilities and attractions of any place are known even to those who reside in or near it, much less to those at a distance, although these or many of them may be of an inquiring disposition and willing to learn all that may be obtained without too much effort or expense. We must make ourselves known abroad, and let the people of every clime and race whose disposition it is to reach out and acquire feelings beyond their own borders know what we have to offer as an inducement for them to be with us in a business sense at least.

There are various means of advertising, legitimate and otherwise. A community that has so large a percentage of good newspapers as this is in possession of a medium whose power in the desired direction should not be and we believe is not underestimated; and when to such vehicle of disseminating information is added a Chamber of Commerce composed of influential, enterprising, go-ahead taxpayers, it is easy to understand that we then have all the requisite means, and the only thing needed is to keep them in constant operation. Salt Lake's advantages in the respects spoken of would do credit to cities of much larger growth, but it is a justifiable fear which is entertained that they are not as fully appreciated and upheld as they should be.

On Saturday last the News published a card from Hon. Frederick H. Auerbach, president of the Chamber of Commerce of this city, in which it was shown that the institution was in need of material assistance, calling upon those in arrears to settle at once, and inviting as many as are in sympathy with its aims and purposes to come forward and enroll their names as members. This latter should, it may well be believed, embrace every business man of high standing in the community. The entrance fee and subsequent dues are so very small that it would seem that there are few indeed who would be excluded on that account, and it is to be hoped that the call will meet with a hearty and immediate response—not by word of mouth, not by sympathy altogether, although these have their use—but also by the more substantial and in fact indispensable method of actual membership and prompt payment of the slight taxation imposed thereby.

Let us rally round the Chamber of Commerce! It will do good not only to this city but the whole of our young and promising State, whose possibilities are beyond computation and whose actualities are but partly placed before us. The Chamber will be the means of opening new markets, of attracting new investors, of stimulating the enterprises already in existence and [illegible] encouragement to those which are yet to come. It will, in fact, be the great [illegible] labor centers [illegible] in which efforts of all kinds and labor in every department will move upon a higher plane.

BRITAIN IN THE SOUDAN.

As the days go by there is more than ever an anxiety as to the fate in store for the British expedition to the Soudan. One thing is reasonably certain, viz: that if there is sufficient strength in the combined efforts of the Soudanese the present British and Egyptian force will meet with great [illegible], for all the tribes of that region have a bitterly hostile feeling toward the English, as they have also for other western Europeans.

It is not to be expected, however, that even a [illegible] defeat of the [illegible] now advancing [illegible] would [illegible] Britain [illegible] as the [illegible] of Adowa caused the Italians to relinquish their policy in Abyssinia. British persistency and determination are not of the same order as that displayed recently by the Italians of sunny Italy. If it had been an English force instead of that within the Abyssinians had to contend with that was defeated, the United Kingdom would have been [illegible] with a demand for vengeance that would have [illegible] all the nation's available striking power to retrieve the loss and maintain the national reputation as a conqueror and ruler of semi-barbarous peoples.

But the impending danger to Britain is not from the opposition of the Soudanese alone. Behind it is the possibility of a combination between King Menelek of Abyssinia and the Khalifa, with a backing to the former by Russia. True, the Soudanese leader refused such an alliance with Menelek's predecessor, but conditions have changed, and the dervishes now prefer Abyssinia's friendship to its enmity. In religion, the Abyssinians approach that of the Russian orthodox church, while the Russians have shown great interest in Abyssinia for a number of years. In fact, it is freely asserted that Menelek's tatics in the Italian campaign were largely directed by Russian officers and advisers. In the event of an alliance between the two African peoples, the Russian sympathy would remain where it is, and the combination probably would prove altogether too much for Britain, not alone because of what might occur on the battlefields of Africa, but by reason of the complications in Europe. In view of these circumstances, it is reasonable to conclude that British success in the Soudan depends more on the outcome of diplomacy in Europe than in the passages of arms in the Soudan. If England meets with defeat in a determined warlike policy in Central Africa, we may be sure that an awful shaking of bones will alarm some other European nations. Because of this possibility, the whole world is concerned in what Great Britain makes up her mind to attempt, for we may anticipate no half way measures about it, even if it sets Europe all ablaze.

WHITHER ARE WE GOING?

The question of whither the country is going is as an outcome of existing complications in political and industrial affairs, has been the subject of many discussions and prognostications, some hopeful and some otherwise. The latest to claim public notice is that made by Senator Tillman, who declared in Denver yesterday that "the country is going to hell," and added, "let us show the world that we know it, and that we are determined to interfere." Of course Senator Tillman spoke as a politician.

Maybe the South Carolina firebrand is right. If going to "hell" is getting into a state of turmoil, with the masses of the people plundered and oppressed, there is every probability that he is correct. In fact the country has had a taste of that already, and in all probability is doomed to more of it. But the "interference" of rabid politicians will not change the course; it is just that which has promoted the movement toward the troublesome [illegible] and will give it acceleration here in the future. There has been too much "interference" by the manipulators of political machines; too many professional politicians have been "in the saddle," and the popular government horse has been ridden very hard. This applies to no particular party, but generally, and as long as the masses of voters can be swayed by political "bosses" the course will be unchanged. The outlook for a variation in the program is not the brightest at present, but ultimately the nation will come through all right, albeit it may be by an experience that will teach the people in whom to put their trust.

HIS MEMORY WAS BAD.

Our attention has been called by Mr. Albert Merrill of this city to recent publications in the South Norwalk, Conn., Sentinel, respecting the Mormon people. These publications are of a class that was common some years ago in journals ignorant of the truth regarding Utah, or those having a vicious tendency; hence we do not often care to pay much attention to them farther than to suggest that the chief trouble is that they are not like, and their inspiration is wholly devoid of the Christian spirit which is commonly supposed to actuate the preachers and revivalists who frequently start the stories.

One incident related in the Sentinel is with reference to Rev. W. H. Boole, of the First Methodist Episcopal church at South Norwalk. The gentleman had arranged a lecture on his visit to Utah made in 1871, in company with Rev. J. P. Inskip and others who held a Methodist camp meeting on Third South street. Mr. Boole had set the day for his lecture on "Experiences among the Mormons," but a few days prior to the date of his intended delivery he died suddenly from heart disease.

Dr. Boole being dead, the Rev. A. N. Kavanagh presented the lecture. In it Mr. Boole was made the hero of the alleged events related. It was told how President Brigham Young warned the Mormons against going to the Methodist camp meeting; how that when Mr. Boole [illegible] the Mormon religion he was greeted with an angry [illegible] Mormon, and so he went on there "[illegible] the [illegible]" [illegible] howling after [illegible] and shaking [illegible] how Mr. Boole was in danger of being shot down, but was saved by the knowledge "that Camp Douglas had its batteries trained upon every street in the city," and by "[illegible]" and [illegible] "[illegible]" [illegible] for the alleged disorders; and how that the house where Mr. Boole stayed was "mobbed that night," and that before the week was over "the Mormons were conquered."

All of which goes to show, to speak mildly, that the Rev. Boole had a very short memory. The incident of the Methodist revival in Salt Lake City is well remembered here. A failure to impress it on the minds of those acquainted with the circumstances is the fact that it was the first and last [illegible], and that President Young repeatedly invited the Mormons to attend and listen, especially urging the young people to do so. The leading spirit of the week's meetings was the Rev. Mr. Inskip, and not Mr. Boole, who cut a very small figure, the latter story arising from the fact that the limited amount of speaking he did was of an insulting nature not called for by his profession or the circumstances; as the Sentinel says of his editorial slippery of him, his methods were more radical than the test meeting could endure. The sensational story about the attempt to kill him is made out of whole cloth. At one of the meetings of the revival referred to, one of the speakers—perhaps it was Dr. Boole—was so ungentlemanly as to begin hurling vile epithets against people who had treated him courteously and showed a far more Christian spirit than he possessed. This evoked a contradiction from two or three impulsive persons in the outskirts of the audience, but it was quickly suppressed by the Mormons in attendance. In fact the conduct of the [illegible] was quite insignificant, but the conduct of the person that called it forth was of such a nature that some of his associates [illegible] apologize for his rudeness.

So far as the Mormons are concerned, the untrue stories about them are so common that they will not particularly mind Mr. Boole's fiction. Besides, the people of the United States are coming to realize the motive for such stories and are placing them at their true value by knowing the Mormons more considerably and kindness than ever was known before. In this changed condition Utah's people can afford to forgive those who have borne false witness against them, leaving the settlement of all tales of that kind to the One who shall judge all men. But it was a little unkind to Mr. Boole to forget his Methodist confreres, the Revs. Inskip, McDonald, Coleman, Osborn and Searles, and [illegible] all the glory [illegible] the alleged conquering of the Mormons. Perhaps his memory will improve by the time he meets them again.

THE GRANGER, published at [illegible], Utah, has reached our exchange table. It is to be issued weekly by F. A. [illegible] and T. E. [illegible]. Its [illegible] is non-partisan in politics, and will work for the advancement of Payson interests in particular and of the State interests in general. The first number is well got up, and while it makes no pretentious claims is a very creditable piece of newspaper work. We wish it success.

A CANVASS of voters' preferences in California as between McKinley, Allison, Reed, Cullom and Morton for the next President shows [illegible] in favor of McKinley, with [illegible] second choice.
