The question was that no cattle had been done on the stream, in question, that there was no village or settlement in Grass valley, but that people lived on their farms and that nearly all of the people had wells and springs from which they used water for culinary purposes, and did not use the water of the stream for corn purposes. And also that the prosecution was brought by cattle men, whose object was to drive the sheep from the range.

In the case of W. L. Elwood vs. Edward Malmquist et al., a suit for $700 and interest on a promissory note given in 1892. The jury brought in a verdict for plaintiff against all the defendants except W. P. Bowen, who endorsed upon whom notice of patent had not been serve.

At the Head of Provo River.

Messrs. Booth and McEwan, who visited the lakes at the head of Provo river with a view to learn whether the water in the river could be increased by damming the water from the lakes, report that the stream have returned. They visited sixteen of the lakes and report that the water in the river can be greatly increased by water from the lakes at a small expense. They are also enthusiastic over the great amount of timber in the mountains at the head of the river and Mr. McEwan says that when he was going to and said the grading that had been done on the Utah Central railroad for about thirty miles, and the ties lying there ready to be put in place, he thought it a useless piece of curiosity to construct a railroad through that country; but after he had looked over the vast quantity of timber he concluded that a railroad would have work for years in carrying lumber and timber, if no other business was to be done, and concluded it was a great pity that the road had not been completed.
