KHAMSIN.

O, the red Khamsin, the desert blow in! Khamsin!
Blow from the desert the desert blow in!
Make it come from the heart of the fiery south,
Bring its breath cool and the fragrance the night
And it shall be cool with its scorching.

The wind from the desert blow in!

Blowed the tents on the alkaline beach,
And it shrieked the twin in the palm groves there
Where the camels knelt down on their knees,
Where and perished was he.
The was consumed with anger,
The dogs ran mad and howl in the night
The hot sun above like a copper shell,
Burned to a cinder the dead of yesterday,
The water carrier sank with a moan,
He died and dry was the water skin—
And the wind from the desert blow in!

The camel crouched for the scrubbing wind,
And so, the proud mare it mutter
The scimitar, hiss and blow back sand.

Bared and swam in the tawny fury,
Bare and swam in the fury of sand,
Bare fire and drank were the fire that poured
The wine without in the clear hot,
Sweet as a harvest, yellow through
The hard parts which were the fire's blood red—
And still blew the scimitar, hot Khamsin
Blow!

The wind from the desert blow in.

Into the cool of the mosque it crept,
Where the pious sought rest at the Prophet's
Tomb—
He knew it was for the faithful when
Bared the hand of the man who slept,
And was gone bangled with sword or whip
The hand Religious but the work
Was hard hot, stained as the worker's beneath
Then a wind arose and swirled and swept
Then a wind arose, hard and hot, swept
Like a scourge of red—
The prayer! The prayer! The pious!
Oh, the wind Khamsin,
The scourge from the desert blow in!
—Charles Stedman in Century.

ANTRIM'S DEATH.

There is an interlection in the clotting of human blood that is fortunately given to but few men to have. Some men are more susceptible to it than others—just as some men degenerate more rapidly into drunkards by the drinking of wine than others. This blood drunkenness is not war. Soldiers seldom know it. In war when you feel your bayonet sink to the shank in the soft quivering breast of another, or drop a man with a bullet, you lose interest in the man you have killed and jerk out your bayonet or load your rifle for another. Blood drunkenness is mostly killing for the sake of killing.

A hundred years ago this blood drunkenness was recognized by the law prohibiting butchers from serving as jurymen. It is still recognized in our treasure, where the constraints of law are not so rigorous as in populous communities. A half score years ago it was more common than at present. There were but few seasons then but had their blood dipsomania.

Joe Marion had one, and his name was Billy Antrim. Had he been an ancient Greek instead of being an American, mythology would have made his great heredity manifest. Even only a boy when he got his first taste of blood. When death overtook him he was but twenty-three, yet he was known to have killed more men than there were years in his age. All but his mother rejoiced at his death all if a great load had been staid.

There was another woman, though, that rejoiced to see his body laid out well and starlike. Still, the dead man had loved her, and she had lived with him as a wife lives with a husband, yet it was not for jealousy she killed him. Before she had met him she had loved another man. His name was Charley Clancy. He was foreman of the H-B Cattle company, on the Rio Grande, near Tularosa. The people along the river called it the H bar H outfit. He, too, was a young man just from the east, with no more business to be in New Mexico at that time than Lucifer in a preacher has in purgatory.

When he had first met the girl it was in Las Cruces—that strange little town near the Mexican line whose history runs back to the Spanish conquest. He was young and green, and perhaps homesick, and it was not long before he was in love with this girl of alien race, for she was a Mexican. After that he found the ranch more and more lonesome and Las Cruces more and more pleasant. Home could not have been more desolate. When a man is in love and his love is returned by a beautiful girl, with her presence any place is heaven. It was so in this case, and Clancy's visits to Las Cruces became very frequent.

One day while he was there there was a prisoner brought into town whom government officials were more anxious than if he had been the governor of the territory, for it was this man Billy Antrim. Every one crowded to see the desperado, and with them went Clancy, for no man was ever more feared or more noted for his bravery. So great was the terror inspired by his deeds that when his trial came there were few men who would serve as jurors. Among those who did serve was Charley Clancy. He was young and green, and they made him foreman of the jury. When the girl—you need not know her name, for it is that of a good family, as good as your own perhaps, and besides she, too, is dead now and it would avail you nothing—well, when she learned this she implored Clancy, in her terror, to hold out, lest he only succeed in her tears and unnerved her knees with fears. She was a mirror of the country, and he a stranger, that, boy-like, he thought he knew it all.

When the trial was ended and the death sentence imposed, for that was the only verdict possible, Clancy returned to his ranch one less cattle, promising the girl not to be long absent. While he was gone the man whose death he had voted for escaped prison. The judge who had presided at the trial in his terror left the country and went to Santa Fe to be safe, and the girl went to Clancy to be safe by his guard and come to her at once. Meanwhile, she thought that while with her no danger would touch him. He received the letter, saw matters thought it would not do to leave his ranch so it in fear. The judge who went to Santa Fe was old enough to be his grandfather. At any other time Clancy would have been only too glad to have gone to the girl of his choice.

While he rode and debated when it would do to go to her, one morning there rode up to his door two men, and one of them was Antrim. When he saw them it was too late for Clancy to attempt to arm himself. All he could do was to answer their questions and submit to being for their prisoner. The men took their horses and tied him in front of his door to a post, and then Antrim told him they he intended to kill him. Clancy knew the man too well to ask for mercy. If he was to be killed he would meet death like a man. It was hard, though, to leave the girl without one word of parting. If he had only looked for her.

When he was tied so that he could not move hand or foot, Antrim walked off twenty or thirty paces, and drawing his revolver called Clancy's attention to his right wrist and fired. Clancy could no longer hold that bullet in his wrist in his hand. When he tried to move his fingers the muscles seemed to have grown suddenly numb.

Antrim laughed and asked him what he thought of such mutilation. The boy did not answer. A new hope, though, had come into his breast. They would not kill him outright, merely maim him, and with the girl to help him he would not mind that. Anything but separation from her.

Then Antrim spoke to him again and fired, and the same numb feeling came into his left hand below the wrist, where he had felt the second pistol ball crush through the bone and sinew. But he did not wince. Surely the man who fooled on big job and innocent would be satisfied with the man's in revenge and now show him mercy.

If Charley Clancy had not been fresh from the east he would know that this was "punishing" a man to death—an old method of horses caught from the Indians. But now a white man was doing it. There are but few instances where white men have tried their hands at it, though it is very simple. All that there is to do is to shoot a man as many times as possible without killing him, until you are tired of the sport and willing that he should die.

The first time it was ever tried by by one white man on another was on the Union Pacific railroad. They will point out the station to you. It is Julesburg. Clancy, though, was not long enough in the west to have even heard of it. Before the day was done he learned it all, though. Shot after shot Antrim put into his arms and legs until you could have twisted them like a piece of rubber hose in any direction you desired. Between the shots he and his companion would smoke their cigarettes and jest and divide the plunder they had taken from the house. And Clancy would faint with pain and weakness as the hot iron beat down on him. Sometimes he would not regain consciousness until Antrim had fired two or three shots in succession into his body. He never showed the white feather, though. When he found out that it was no use to beg—for life, even if the best successes in a cause was good enough to risk for the woman he simply thought of the girl and cursed in his severe the coward office of the man who was murdering him.

Everything must have an end, though. So it is with "punishing." When the sun had nearly passed away and the sun was sinking in the west, leaving the lonely house on the unbroken mesa in darkness, Antrim grew tired of the sport and told Clancy so, and while lifting it he emptied his revolver into the stomach and bowels of the man tied to the stake. Then he and his comrade saddled their horses, and Clancy, dying as he was, wondered if they were going to leave him to the night and darkness, when the coyotes, attracted by his blood, would come to continue the work that day had seen begun. His mind was still clear, and when Antrim walked forward him he tried to curse him for the coward he was, until Antrim, placing his pistol against Clancy's teeth, forced the muzzle into his mouth and pulled the trigger, and then the day's work was over.

There was no concealment about it. Every one in New Mexico knew what Charley Clancy had died for, but few men spoke of it above their breath. The judge who went to Santa Fe staid there. No man cared to meet Antrim. There was only one officer in the territory who had the courage to make the attempt to apprehend him, but so well did the murderer conceal his movements that it was impossible to follow him. Rewards after reward was offered, yet no one came to earn them.

When Clancy's body was found it was taken into Las Cruces and buried in the little graveyard where the girl's forefathers for generations back had been buried. Through it all the girl did not break down as most women would. People said she was cold, though at evening she would come with her beads and pray by the new made grave until darkness came.

One day she was missing; no one knew whither she had gone. Soon, though, rumors returned that she was in the dissolute frontier towns among the Americans as one of the public dancing girls. She was beautiful and had no lack of lovers. She seemed to be fearless of her fate, and no matter how desperate the men with whom her lot was cast, she never quailed. The Americans called her in boom—the flowers.

Where men squandered the money gained by money and poisoned in wild orgies, in which men fought and killed each other like mad and made she was always cool and unmoved. The wilder the orgies, the worse the men who composed it, apparently the more she enjoyed it. Her beauty was so great that some men, even among the Americans, offered to make her a wife, but she only smiled and refused all with a pertinacity that made them wonder that one in her position could display it. When she was at the height of her popularity she disappeared. No one knew whither, although some said she had left to join a band of desperadoes near the Arizona line.

Wherever it was, nothing was seen of her for months, and then one day the relatives heard that only a shadow of her remained. At first her father would not permit her to enter the house while her mother cried and cushioned her as if she had returned from the dead. Then the father, too, relented. Perhaps he thought it would after all be for her a short time, and it would be better that it should not be spent in the open. The second repentance and tenderness in all. When night came she went to the little graveyard and prayed over the grave that still was the newest.

Where she had spent the months of her absence she never told. To all questions she gave no answer but silence. It was said by some that her return home was due to the troubling up and scattering by the authorities of the band of desperadoes with whom it was rumored she had connected. Going by the rumor, her mother had one day asked her to deny it, but the girl had only dropped her head on her mother's bosom and asked as she had never done since the day she had seen Clancy's body consigned to the earth.

Several times she had received messages, but from whom no one knew. Every to her mother, who alone spoke to her, she declined to call. One day she received one of these messages, and that night after she had gone to her bedroom, dressed to the house of the sheriff, who was the only officer that dared to follow Antrim's murderer. When the sheriff heard he was out, he, hurrying through the dimly lighted passages led him to her room and placed him where he could not be seen in the darkness, and then she lay down in her bed and waited in the darkness as the hours passed until there was a tap at the window. The house was so quiet that the sound to echo like a pistol shot, but the sheriff, still going to the window opened it and let a tall man enter, who threw his arms about her and kissed her passionately and spoke regretfully of the time they had been separated.

The room was very dark, and as she led him from the window to the bed where the other man crouched the sheriff almost lost her heart beat. The man whose arm was around her waist noticed her trembling and drew her more closely to him. When the sheriff thought the hour was so quiet that the sound of the pistol would be stilled he, as it falls with shock.

The air of the room grew thick with the smell of powder, and though the house could be heard voices calling in affright, not in the room no one stirred or uttered a word. The girl was wondering if the man who had fallen was dead or only wounded, and the man who had shot him remained quiet, fearing that after all his shot might have failed him. It was only when the door of the room was opened from without and the light showed a dead contracted figure on the floor that he came forth, and then the girl rose from the bed and gazed coldly down on the body of the man who had murdered her lover.—San Francisco Argonaut.
