THE TWO HORNS.

As the time draws near for holding the national conventions of the various political parties, speculation grows [illegible] as to the outcome of the succeeding contest. From the point of view now obtainable, there appears to be outlined with a degree of distinctness the chief issues to be presented by the great political parties, that is if both proceed with solid front to the contest; and from the nearest observation that we now [illegible], it is apparent that instead of the three or more parties in the field that seemed likely a few weeks ago, there is a strong probability that there will be only two of any importance.

There is hardly a doubt as to what will be the platform and candidate of the Republican convention. In the financial plank it will be the [illegible] of the "sound money" advocates, commonly known as the gold standard, with a candidate agreeable thereto. Of the Democratic position there is not so much certainty, although indications are very promising that "free silver" will be the slogan of that party in the financial part of the discussion. If this be the case, it is almost certain that the [illegible] concerning the Populists in Indiana will be carried into effect whether or not there is the understanding referred to, as stated in our dispatches last evening, the situation is that if the Democrats nominate a free silver candidate on a free silver platform, the Populist vote will go solidly in that direction as the only means of making it effective on the financial idea of that party. Yet while the prospect is good for the Chicago convention to afford this opportunity for the Populists to unite with it in this election, there is something of an impending danger that that convention may be split as wide open on the financial issue as the [illegible] convention of the same party was on a different proposition. Still, there were prospects of a Republican convention split some time ago, and it may be that danger of possible division will pass by as readily as in the other case, before the Democratic convention meets.

If the big parties go as now seems probable if they hold together entire, the dilemma that presents itself before the voter will be of a rather remarkable nature. It will have but two main horns, it is true; but each of these horns also has two, on which to puzzle the voter in his choice. The Republican horn will be: protection and the gold standard; that of the Democracy: free trade and free silver; at least that is the way they will be paraphrased in political discussions. The Republican voters who believe in free silver and protection will be in a fix as to whether or not it is better to throw their tariff ideas over for the hope in silver; the Democratic voters who uphold the gold standard will be sorely puzzled as to whether or not a protective tariff should be endured by them in preference to submitting to the "silver craze," as they term it. And thus the choice is logically forced back to the tariff proposition.

The problem is "mighty interesting," to say the least, and will get more so as it is worried at. If the voters of the country merely had to select as between a solid Democratic or a solid Republican horn, the result might be easy to foretell; but when each party is divided so as to a more difficult choice between two horns in its own affairs, the situation becomes complicated. And on the principle that "a house divided against itself cannot stand," it is barely possible that the choosing in the coming Presidential election may lead to a readjustment of party lines not altogether unanticipated but as yet not definitely set forth.

WOMEN'S FEDERATIONS.

The meeting of the women's federation of clubs, held in this city yesterday and today, is in many respects a notable gathering, and ought to be a means of producing much good. The discussion of subjects of reform in society are valuable for the thoughts they bring forth and the probable fruit that these will bear. Of course the women may be expected to debate with some show of wisdom and [illegible] the problems of politics, and in this way reach about as satisfactory conclusions as men do, and like them, end up with being on all sides of the question. But it is in the line of social and political purity that women, both in the home and as exercising the right of suffrage, have their greatest opportunity.

The "corruption" of politics is generally conceded by the bulk of people nowadays, and it is painfully in evidence all over the land that corruption in society is little if any less appalling. There is a very large share of the people uncontaminated by either, but the tendency toward submission to both seems to be growing more general, until very many people [illegible] the future with much anxiety. It must be conceded that men have not been able to stem the tide, either in their political or social capacity, although there has been a great and noble work accomplished in checking the drift to immorality in politics and society.

If the women take hold in earnest in the new position they are assuming before the public, there is a vast field before them, and peradventure they may accomplish great good. They will do it in the proper methods of labor they are devoted and united. They will wield a vast influence in politics and society; and in the former it is not alone at the ballot box or in conventions, any more than in the latter it is at balls and theaters. The most effective field of operations is right in the homes of the people. If women [illegible] the family relation, their influence in its most potent form is given. [illegible] in that relation they wield an influence, unattainable by others, in [illegible] husbands and guiding sons and daughters to the higher conditions of life. When they imprint, by conduct and precept, upon the minds of children a feeling of revulsion toward political corruption and an abhorrence for personal impurity that will cause those children to keep themselves aloof from such conditions, and [illegible] husbands, fathers and mothers with their earnestness to the good cause, then will a [illegible] be [illegible] against wrong-doing than is being exerted at present by very many people. Federations of women's clubs and conventions all can be made a means towards accomplishing such a result, and in that there is great good; if they are directed in other lines, there is grave doubt as to their producing anything more of value than we now have in operation.

IS THE PROBLEM SOLVED?

Once more it is announced that the flying machine is an accomplished fact, and if it is not premature the announcement is of about equal importance to that which years ago apprised the world of the fact that steam could be used for the propulsion of vessels at sea and cars on land. An airship under the perfect control of its navigators is sure to inaugurate a perfect revolution in the traffic of the world and mark a new stage in man's civilization. Prof. Samuel P. Langley of the Smithsonian Institute is the constructor of the new airship, and it is stated that on the sixth of May he sent up a model driven by a small steam engine. It rose about one hundred feet and proceeded on its flight half a mile. Then the coal was exhausted and the machine slowly descended to the ground. A second flight was made with equal success.

The New York World publishes an account of the flying machine, or aerodrome, as it is called, said to be furnished by Prof. Bell of telephone fame. He says it is constructed of a steel framework, between which are extended horizontally three sheets of canvas, one above the other. The entire length is fifteen feet and the total weight twenty-five pounds. It is only a model for experimental purposes, but its correct construction being demonstrated, the next question will be to give it the required size for practical purposes and the right kind of an engine. The difficulties will be less as the dimensions are enlarged, and the speed that can be attained is one hundred miles an hour or more.

The principle on which the aerodrome is constructed is explained as entirely different from that governing the balloon. The latter floats because its total volume is lighter than the air; the former flies by means of the resistance of the planes to the air current, in the same way as a kite, or a card thrown edgewise. It may be, the World adds, that the aerodrome of the future will for greater safety be attached to a trolly wire, doing away with the necessity of carrying any engine at all. "Who can say that ten years hence we may not see such a line as this running across the continent with a continuous flight of aerodromes departing and arriving at thirty-minute intervals?"

Well, man is steadily advancing. Flammarion suggested the idea that the air is really the ideal medium of communication between the different parts of the globe, and that but for the fact that gravitation is so strong on this earth that brain matter is comparatively heavy, the highest forms of life would have been found among the beings that soar the air instead of among those that crawl in the dust. Certain it is that there has always been a longing among men to imitate the birds in their majestic flight, and the realization of this ambition is now generally looked upon as one of the probabilities of the near future. We are likely to hear more about Prof. Langley's aerodrome before long.

CONTEMPT OF COURT.

In view of recent comment here, the decision of the New York court of appeals, rendered a few days ago on the matter of contempts of court, has an interesting application. The New York court decides that a newspaper man can criticise a judge's action or decision as he pleases, or as he would any other man, and not be subject to arrest for contempt of court; if the judge is wronged he can bring a libel suit, like any other individual. The occasion for the decision was presented by the effort of County Judge Jacob H. Clute of Albany, to send to prison for contempt of court three members of the staff of the Albany Evening Journal who criticised him in print for an action which he performed as judge. His effort [illegible] but the court of appeals [illegible] to declare that contempt of court is an offense committed in the presence of the court and during its session, and is not committed by criticism outside, in [illegible].

This appears to be a fair and ample expression of the rule which applies to contempt cases, and is in accord with our formerly expressed opinion on this subject, when referring to a rule recently adopted by the State Supreme court, which, by the way, has special reference to contempts by attorneys, and does not include persons not associated with the work of courts.

There probably is a little distinction between the New York statute and the Utah law on contempt of court, for the latter recognizes as such an attorney's criticism outside of court where this reflects on the judicial integrity of the judge. On behalf of the Utah court which recently adopted the rule, it may be stated that the purpose thereof was to give effect to the statute on that particular point, so that when an attorney, disgruntled perhaps because a judge has decided adversely to his view, goes about maligning the official who did not [illegible] his [illegible] he can be called to account therefor. So far as that goes, it is proper. An attorney is in one sense part of the court, in being an adviser thereof on the law; and if he indulges in libelous remarks, impugning the honor of a judge in his official capacity, the court should be in a way to dispense with such attorney's service as an adviser, by disbarment proceedings for contempt. Of course a self-respecting lawyer will not indulge in such remarks; in his respect for himself and his calling he respects the court. But when there is an attorney not sufficiently scrupulous on this point, the proper way for the court to maintain its dignity is not to lay supinely back and let an abusive tongue wag at its own pleasure, but to command respect by enforcing a wholesome rule, requiring from advisers of the court that in that capacity they conduct themselves decently toward judges and brother attorneys in official relations. When, however, the objectionable remarks are outside of the circle of the court and attorneys practicing therein, the proper remedy appears to us to be that indicated by the New York decision, which seems to us good law and sound sense on the matter.

KIRTLAND TEMPLE TODAY.

A recent issue of the Cleveland Plaindealer gives a description of the Temple at Kirtland, Ohio, as it stands today. The town of its location is a quiet place away from the railway, which passes through Mentor, six miles distant, and the former home of President Garfield. The Temple is now in possession of the Reorganized church, which has held four of its conferences there, the last being in April of this year. The Plaindealer says of the building in its present condition:

This prominent and historical building was built in 1833-35. It stands on an elevated portion of the town overlooking much of the surrounding country. It has three stories and is [illegible] feet from the foundation to rafter and is [illegible] feet long by [illegible] feet wide.

The interior is remarkably arranged. There are two series of pulpits, one at each end of the Temple, and each pulpit is designed to seat three persons. The pulpits in the west end are for the presidents of some of the leading quorums of the Melchisedec Priesthood and those at the east end for the presidents of the Aaronic Priesthood. There are four tiers of pulpits at either end, all of which are lettered. On the west end the first tier has the letters P. E. M., which stand for presiding Elder of Melchisedec Priesthood. The second tier is lettered as follows: M. P. H., Melchisedec high Priesthood. The third is lettered P. M. H., presiding Melchisedec High Priest. The fourth is lettered M. P. C., Melchisedec Priesthood council. The pulpits of the east end consist of the following letters: First tier, P. D. A., presiding Deacon of Aaronic Priesthood. The second tier is lettered P. T. A., presiding Teacher Aaronic Priesthood. The third tier is lettered P. A. P., presiding Aaronic Priest. The fourth is lettered B. P. A., Bishop, president of Aaronic Priesthood.

Subsequent to the exodus of the Saints from Kirtland in 1838 the Temple was badly neglected by reason that there were none left who took that interest in the building to keep it in good condition. However, in [illegible] the Reorganized church, having come in possession of the building, expended a considerable amount of money in repairing and restoring it to its former beauty and grandeur. The Temple has been painted white on the inside with the exception of the seats, and this gives the interior a clean, pure appearance. There have been four world's conferences held in said building within the last thirteen years, the first conference being held in 1883, second in [illegible], the third in 1891, and the fourth in 1896.
