WOMAN'S WORLD.

Austria Has a Joan of Arc.

In the town of Buchenstein, in the southern part of the Austrian Tyrol, there has been erected a striking stone figure. It shows a tall, buxom peasant girl, standing in an attitude of defiance, with a three-lined pitchfork, which she is wielding as a weapon. Behind her is one of the wooden crosses that are used in all European graveyards. The statue commemorates the heroic deeds of a Tyrolean girl, who lives in Austrian and Swiss story as the Joan of Arc of Austria, although her history is not known generally to the rest of the world. It is well worth knowing, however, for it is not only a story of heroism, but one of wonderful modesty.

This Austrian Joan of Arc was named Katherine Lanz. Unlike the French heroine, the history of the Austrian girl is based on recorded facts, for her achievements date back only a little more than a century.

Katherine Lanz was a servant in a village known as Springes when the French army appeared there on April 2, 1797. While the Tyrolese were making their stand in front of the village the inhabitants all fled to the mountains, so that at last there was none left except Katherine, who was then 23 years old and a very handsome, strong girl.

She ransacked the deserted houses and looted herself down with the stores of the provisions that she found in them. With these she made trip after trip to the firing line and refreshed the Tyrolean fighters.

As the fight grew hotter, Katherine Lanz pressed forward more and more, until at last she was in the very front of the conflict. Finally, at the critical moment of the battle, she seized a pitchfork and leaped on to top of the low stone wall around the graveyard, where she helped the Tyrol men to fight hand to hand with the French.

At last the latter were beaten off. But in the meantime more French columns had made a roundabout march and had climbed the mountain. Thence they entered the churchyard from the rear, and they were pressing forward secretly to fall on the Tyrolese from behind, when suddenly Katherine, with her pitchfork, appeared before them in the gathering gloom and charged the foremost soldiers with a cry of warning.

The sudden appearance of the strange figure from behind a graveyard, taken in connection with the solemn surroundings, threw the French soldiers into disorder, which was increased by the force and swiftness with which the girl wielded the pitchfork. The end was that they fell in to such confusion that, before they could recover their formation, the Tyrolean advanced and beat them back, driving them up the mountain in scattered flight.

And now comes the most interesting part of the history of the heroine of Springes. After the war she went to Colle St. Lucia, which was a favorite resort of tourists then as it is now. The tourists then had to find shelter in the house of the curate of the place, because there was no hotel. All the visitors took the greatest deal of the girl who had so distinguished herself, and wondered who she might have been. Katherine had tried to conceal the fact of her participation in the battle from everybody, and the curate was the only one in St. Lucia who knew of it.

He advised her to continue to keep it secret, "for," said he, "you will only belittle your work in the sight of God if you accept earthly honor and praise for it."

Katherine took his advice, and she never betrayed herself until she was an old, old woman. Then, not long before she died, she yielded at last to the urging of the few who knew of her deeds and told the fact.

She was housekeeper for a curate in Buchenstein when she died. After she was gone all the official facts relating to her were gathered by Judge Kasper Repp and sent to Innsbruck, where they are in the archives now, accompanied by authenticated documents. One of these documents is written by Philip von Wornelle, who was commandant as Spingee when the French attacked it.

Loneliest Home in the World.

England tried recently to remove the inhabitants of Tristan d'Aunha to South Africa, because everybody pitted the people for their loneliness. Nobody dreamed that they would be anything but delighted at the chance, but, to the amazement of the English, they refused to leave their lonely islet, and the warship that had been sent to get them and their possessions was forced to return without them.

Tristan d'Aunha is little more than a rock. It has barely enough vegetation to support a few herds of cattle and to supply the needs of the 15 men, women and children that live on it. It is a desolate shore out of immense depths in mid-ocean, half way between Cape Horn and the Cape of Good Hope, and the only persons whom the inhabitants see from the outer world are the sailors of the British warship which calls at the island once a year.

The English offered the people excellent land without charge in South Africa and other aid necessary to establish them comfortably in their new home. But they replied that they were happy where they were, and that they feared that they would not fit into the world. They have so little to do on their deep-sea rock that they are not very active, and they do not care to enter the competition of the civilized world. They are very peaceable and kind, perfectly sober and highly moral.

There has never been a crime of any sort on Tristan d'Aunha. There is no jail. There is no money. There is no newspaper. The island has no postoffice, no shop of any kind, no school, and no laws. There is no office, either. One man is as good as another, and no man has authority over another. Each one lives as he deems best, and he need pay neither taxes nor other assessments. The people are very intelligent and handsome. They have lost all track of time and dates, and do not care about the events of the world at all.

A NATURAL SANITARIUM.

What a Scientific Observer Has to Say About California.

Lieut. John P. Findley, while in charge of the United States weather bureau at San Francisco, contributed an article to a prominent magazine on the climatic conditions of California, in which the following statement appeared: "Theoretically, California should furnish the best and most varied health resort and sanitariums in the United States. Within her borders almost every form of wasting disease should find the means of temporary, if not permanent, relief. For descriptive and illustrative literature, call on or address D. R. Gray, general agent, S. Pac. Co., 201 Main street, Salt Lake City, Utah.

Of altitude there is yet a greater difference. From Plain Valley, 300 feet below sea level, to the upper Sierras, 7,000 or 8,000 above, any altitude can be selected, and comfortable homes be found.

The peculiarity of an almost rainless summer, during which the injurious germs of animal and vegetable decay are destroyed by thorough desiccation, is one of the striking features of California climate.

During the rainy season it is usually too cool to facilitate fermentation, and the result is, except along some of the river valleys, an absolutely pure atmosphere. The ocean winds entering through the several coast openings, are tempered by the intermediate area passed over, and often receive desirable healing properties by taking up the resinous odors of the pines and redwoods of the coast range.

The skillful physician, acquainted with the climatic conditions, should find little difficulty in selecting a locality where climate and environment will do all that these agencies can ever do toward the restoration of health. There is enough of wisdom to keep the mind constantly engaged, and enough of civilization to satisfy the most exacting.

People whose systems are charged with malaria, or are "run down" by overwork, find immediate and in many cases permanent relief in this invigorating climate. For descriptive and illustrative literature, call on or address D. R. Gray, general agent, S. Pac. Co., 201 Main street, Salt Lake City, Utah.

The low "differential" rates made by the Erie Railroad effect a marked economy for those who travel much, and the saving is surely worth while even for a single trip. Yet the service is strictly first class. The rate between Chicago and New York is considerably less than two cents a mile. Reasonable, isn't it? Write Room 55, Railway Exchange, Chicago, for time tables, booklets, etc.

You See

a good deal about fuel saving devices, stoves, furnaces, etc. The best thing we know of in this line is "That Good Coal."
