WEATHER BUREAU REPORT.

The following review of the Utah weather service, for the month of November has just been received:

Atmospheric pressure.—The monthly mean pressure was slightly above the average, being, at the Salt Lake station, 25.70 inches actual pressure, or 30.18 inches reduced to sea-level.

There was but one decided low-pressure area, which occurred on the 24th; the month was therefore pleasant except on that date, when the pressure fell to 29.88 (sea-level), and a heavy snow-storm was general over the greater part of Utah. The storm was attenuated by high winds, and followed by a severe cold wave, during which the lowest temperature of the month occurred at nearly all stations. The highest pressure, (30.54 sea-level) occurred on the 13th. The monthly range of pressure, 1.15 in., is the greatest on record for any November except that of 1886.

Temperature.—The monthly mean, deduced from 20 stations, was 38.7 degrees. It was probably about the normal for the Territory, being above the normal in the northern part, and below in the southern. Until the 18th the temperature remained close to the normal; then for six days a warm spell lasted; then a cold spell occurred lasting until the 27th.

The warmest spell occurred on different dates in different localities; the coldest spell was uniform, occurring from the 24th to 27th, at nearly all stations. 43.5 was the highest mean temperature reported, occurring at Fillmore, Millard county; 28.7 was the lowest reported, occurring at Grouse Creek, Box Elder county. Reports from St. George and Scofield, which usually give the extremes for each month, have not been received. Fillmore reported the maximum, 78 on the 12th; the minimum occurred at Loa, Wayne Co., being 6 degrees below zero on the 24th. Loa is situated in a high plateau region, which accounts in a measure for its extreme low temperature.
