

THE CANADIAN FIRES.

During the recent terrible fires in Canada many scenes of suffering occurred, some of which have been described by correspondents.

Driving on we were soon almost overpowered by the stench from the carcasses of cattle which had perished in the flames, their white bones standing out in bold relief against the blackened ground.

Little mounds by the road side marked where other carcasses had been buried. And now we come to another scene of desolation, where there had been, but a few days before, a comfortable and happy home.

We halted near the smaller of the two tents, and out of the larger one came the farmer's wife, a nice looking woman with a very pleasant voice, and with a rosy little four years old girl clinging to her skirts.

Finally she harnessed the horse to the wagon (which had but a single seat), and placing in it her uncle and aunt, an aged couple, three of her own children, and the few clothes and beds saved from the house, she started to seek the shelter of her mother's house, a mile or more away.

Not a dozen rods from where the old man perished the wagon was halted by the roadside. To go further was impossible. To remain seemed like tempting death; but still there was hope.

The children and the old woman were placed under the wagon, and an attempt was made to shut out the flames by hanging up sheets and blankets.

The children escaped with but slight injuries from the fact that they were dressed in woolen clothing. They uttered neither moan nor cry.

That the youngest, as the sparks fell upon her, "I'm burning up." The old lady was badly burned from having on a cotton dress, and her recovery is considered doubtful.

Daylight appearing and the fire having somewhat subsided, they were enabled to reach a place of shelter. It was learned later that the mother's house had been burned before the daughter left her own house.
