“Early Breakfast”
 A Swiss Hunter's Danger.
 A short time ago a hunter on the shore of the Lake of Wallenstadt, in Switzerland, discovered the nest of a pair of these destructive birds, the “ammergler,” a species of vulture. He shot the male, which stood on a projecting rock bent the neck and threw it away. He then cautiously along the precipice, with a view to taking the young birds.
 He was close upon the nestlings when, to his consternation, the mother ammergler rose up from a rock, flew at him furiously, and descended upon him. The hunter was in imminent danger of falling upon the rocks more than 100 feet below. He remained cool and self-possessed, and clung to the cliff by his life with one hand, the other being powerless in the grasp of the vulture.
 Fortunately, he had his bowling piece slung over his shoulder. He reached cautiously up, placed it against the face of the rock, and pointed it at the breast of the bird. With his toe he destructively touched the trigger and luckily killed the ammergler. Even then he was quite unable to free the vulture's claws from their hold on his sleeve and arm, standing, as he did, on the narrow ledge, where any movement was difficult and dangerous. The arm to which the bird clung was on the side next the cliff, partially supported by the nest, otherwise the dying struggle of the ammergler must have pulled him down upon the rocks.
 He began shouting for help, and finally succeeded in calling a passing shepherd to his aid. He was soon freed from his dangerous position, and carried home two young birds as trophies of his adventure.
