cause a general revival of trade and general prosperity.

It is so great a work that no one man can do it, however enterprising. No one corporation, no one State, no one portion of the country can remove a difficulty which ramifies the whole. It is a general depression into which the wheels of business and labor have sunk, and they can only be started again into brisk activity by a general movement, every man putting his shoulder to the wheel. As no one man alone can start those gigantic wheels, and as financial ruin would quickly come upon any one man or one set of men who might make UGAR Gelden Syrup and Syrup Molasses, In Barrels, Half Burrels and Hogs. This is the public and private policy now pursued throughout this ceuntry. Every one talks of the hard times, and almost every one strives to the best of his ability to make times harder. And so the trouble goes on, becoming worse and worse, with no prospect of relief so long as labor continues devoted solely to the limited industries now existing; with the certainty that the distress will not only grow, but will become chronic, and will develop the hideous issue belonging to a chronic complaint. The drift is steady in that direction, and if not soon averted by the beginning of new enterprises everywhere, to furnish employment to the unemployed, the legitimate outcome of this chronic idleness by wholesale will be deplorable.
