Only Time He Was Knocked Out Was When He Lost to Battling Nelson at Colma.

The earning capacity of boxers is always an interesting subject for discus-sion among the men who keep in touch with the prize ring, but usually it is the men who are retired from active participation who are the favorite subjects of discussion. John L. Sullivan and Jack Dempsey are in this category. In other instances the men bave engaged in so many small fights that there is no record that will even approximate their earning capacity with the gloves.

To Britt's receipts for his fights must be added the money he received from theatrical engagements, which will run up his earnings for the past five years to considerably more than 500,000. Britt's betting operations have been on a modest scale. In nearly every fight in which he has been a principal he has been favorite in the wagering. In many cases he has been at odds of i to 10. He never bet on himself at that price; in fact, he hardly wagered a cent after his first three fighting end of the game, leaving the wagering end to others. Britt has a third interest in the mov-ing pletures, taken of his fight with Nel-son at Colma. The receipts from the ex-hibition of these have run far into the thousands, but those who know the semount are mute on the subject.
