In reply to an inquiry the American Agriculturist says: Potatoes, cabbages, beets, rhubarb, and radishes will not mix if planted near each other unless you raise seed. Corn shows the mixture the first season. Pumpkins, melons and cucumbers do not mix with one another; the different varieties of each crop mix readily, but the mixture does not generally show itself in the fruit until the next generation. Varieties of beans and peas mix more or less, probably by the means of insects.

Begin by fancying that ne one cares for you, that you are not of any use to anybody—a sort of honentity in the household where your place would not be missed, but easily supplied. Ponder on your want of beauty, and lead yourself to believe that no one can love a plain face or think you are agreeable because there are others more charming. Fancy that every one who looks upon you makes a mental cemparison which militates against you in favor of some one else. Imagine that every word said Abraham Hart, of Philadelphia, Presone else. Imagine that every word said in jest is only meant to cover a deeper and more painful one; that every article of wearing apparel you don is criticised and ridiculed. Do all this, and your tendency to morbidity of feeling will so increase that in a very short time you will become one of the most miserable of human beings.
