How Fishes Care for Their Young.

WASHINGTON, April 22.—It is probably not very often that a father stays at home to take care of the children. The duty usually devolves upon mother or sister or nurse. In any case brothers or the hatter would consider it outside his province to mark the no harm came to the little ones. Out at the zoo, too, it is usually the mother who stands guard over her young, who watches them, cleans and feeds and plays with them. But pay a visit to the aquarium, a fresh-water aquarium in its natural state. There it is the gaudy-colored fish who boasts no less a few inches above the cup-shaped nest, bright-eyed, keen and watchful, or darts with a flash and a rainbow swirl to lure away some curious submarine intruder. Among the fishes, at least of the rivers and lakes, custom has placed the burden of care of the young in most cases upon the male. This is more one of a number of interesting facts shown by Dr. Theodore Gill, associate in zoology at the United States National museum, the result of a series of studies upon parental care among freshwater fishes published by the Smithsonian Institution. It has been a general impression among naturalists from the days of Aristotle that fishes are indifferent to their eggs and young and leave them entirely to the care of Mother Nature. And through the teaching of naturalists, therefore, the idea that sea animals have not that instinct which is practically universal among land animals to care for and to protect their offspring even to the sacrifice of their own lives, has been spread abroad. "Oliver Goldsmith in 1774," says Dr. Gill, "told his readers that fishes seem, all except the whale kind, entirely devoid of those parental instincts, which in other animals mark the manners of the more perfect terrestrial animals." Many to the present time entertain that belief. Dr. Gill has devoted much of his life to the study of natural history and is one of the foremost authorities of the country not only upon ichthyology but upon most subjects connected with natural history. His recent studies show beyond a doubt that this is far from the truth. In fact, "the species which manifest care for their young are so numerous," he says, "that the species which are restricted to those which are inhabitants of fresh water." And the curious methods of protection adopted by different families of sea animals, which he discusses in his article, are so many and so varied that it is not a family are not few. Dr. Gill has gotten together practically all that is known among naturalists on the subject. "Naturally the most common or frequent mode of care is the simplest," he says, "consisting of little more than selection of a site for the deposit of the female's eggs and subsequent guardianship of those eggs by the male." The place selected is usually cleared of stones and weeds, and the cleared spaces the eggs are laid. Some, however, go further than this. A certain catfish in Queensland is always very careful to nose and splash and splash around upon them. Dr. Gill has found that some fish, especially those which are inhabitants of fresh water, are very careful to nose and splash and splash around upon them. at a time. And in South American waters there swarms every distant cousin to our catfish which has a method of attaching eggs in a mass to the skin. The skin of the fish then grows out around them like the cup of acorns around an oak sapling. In this manner they are carried and protected until they hatch. Probably many an angler has happened upon such eggs floating in a stream or lake, to all appearances deserted by the parent fish. But these are not mere floatings to be hatched. There has been much work expended upon this floating nest. Perhaps its simplest form, explains Dr. Gill is found in the many colored fish of paradise which a floating nest of a mere condensation of air bubbles held together by a sticky substance from the fish's mouth. Other fishes gather together to bind their rafts twigs and fallen leaves so that a floating nest of this sort looks like little more than a bulk of mud and river waste. There is one species, the stickleback, which is even equipped, besides the usual special, wax-making organs to weave a binding thread for the materials selected for the nest. And it is the general rule, insists in fishes says, "The attributes of parental care must be regarded as an outcome of selfishness, or if you will, self-love, a result of the sense of proprietorship. The eggs are the father's own, and therefore they and the resulting larvae are to be cared for as such."
