

THE GRAVE OF THE PATRIOT WARRIOR.

He lies beneath the mountain-heath,
It is a rude and simple grave;
A narrow mound of loosened ground,
And near it weeds and wild flowers wave.
And by that tomb, with 'neath of bloom,
The tall, tall thistle nods and towers;
And maidens bring, and fondly fling,
Upon its dark sod, daisy, flowers.

No priest has blessed his place of rest,
He died amid the battle's din;
And comrades dear alone were near
The earth they laid the hero in.
No shroud and pall his limbs enthrall,
He lies, as soldier should, arrayed
In feathered crest and warrior vest,
And in his hand his blood-stained blade.

Yet earth ne'er gave a better grave
Than that where he is meanly laid;
And holier spot is worshipped not
By pilgrim or by mourning maid.
Where shall be found a fitter ground
For Valor's sleep than Victory's field?
The field that saw the foe withdraw
And boldly fall, or basely yield.

He wants no tomb 'neath Minister-dome;
For that let proud Ambition strive;—
His glorious deeds are all he needs
To keep his memory long alive:
A Patriot tried he lived and died,
Lived for the land he loved so well;
And at her claim, as it became
A Patriot's part, he fought, and fell.

Then, traveler, stop! and fondly drop
A tear to dust of such high worth;
And mourn that one, so brave a son
Of Freedom, should have left the earth.
And if thou art of free born heart,
Thou'lt pray that, when thy star grows dim,
And death is nigh, thou may'st not die
Less nobly than they tell of him.

I'm lonely, Mary, since you've left;
Of thy presence and thy worth bereft;
For thou wast gentle, pure, and true,
And life's fond hopes were linked with you.
Thou hast left to me a helpless dove,
Pledge, dearest, of our holy love;
And should its virtues be like thine,
'Twill round my heart like thee entwine.
