THE "INSURRECTION" IN PARIS.

The capital of France has had its little trouble, and the adherents of Rochefort, the turbulent demagogue, have indulged in the traditional barricades, shouting Vive la République and creating a disturbance generally. From all the information received by telegraph, the late trouble in Paris does not seem to have been with anything but an unruly mob, animated by a few leaders anxious to bring about a collision between the people and the government. They have not succeeded according to their desires. A few lives have been lost, and several hundred prisoners taken; but it does not appear that the imperial government was in any dread of the mob or its power, as the police were principally employed to quell the disturbance, although troops were massed in and around Paris in sufficient numbers to have quelled even a formidable insurrection.

The Parisians are a people in France. When they have arisen in their strength in the past they have made monarchs flee and have changed the form of the government of the nation. But this time there has been a very limited response to the appeal to arms. A few thousands probably of the vast population of Paris, composed the mob that assailed the Empire and sought to carry out the designs of Rochefort and those associated with him. This rabid demagogue may be a brave man, physically, and desirous of political martyrdom; but he is not a very wise one. Napoleon has manifested a disposition to adopt a much more liberal policy than he has hitherto pursued, and this because of the agitation on the subject and the expressed wish of a large portion of the people. The Genius Consultum, which occupied so much attention sometime ago, may not have been so liberal as many might have wished it to be; but the peaceable policy which obtained that concession from Imperial absolutism would undoubtedly gain more, if it were systematically and persistently followed. Rochefort, though, desires not only to have the blood of his fellow citizens, but he has no hope of a successful insurrection, in the face of the fact that a large number of his fellow Deputies of the "left," or opposition, who are presumed to reflect the sentiments of their constituents, are opposed to his violence, and are seeking by peaceable and constitutional means to secure more liberty for the masses by still further concessions from the Emperor.

Napoleon is not the man to give up, without a terrible struggle, the power he has so long and so successfully wielded; and no ordinary demonstration of popular power could drive him from the throne. Were Paris to become so thoroughly aroused against the Imperial government, that the citizens would arm themselves en masse for a revolution, and could they get the troops to fraternize with them, then the Napoleon dynasty might be in danger of being speedily deprived of power. But no such feelings or desires exist, judging by the course which the Parisians generally have taken in the recent disturbance; and for any man or party of men to try and stir up a wild, hot-headed mob to acts of open hostility against such a force of troops as there is in and around Paris, is to incur the direct responsibility of all the blood that might be shed and lives that might be lost in consequence of the act.

There is in the French character an element which appears to demand change; and this, combined with their natural vanity and recklessness of personal danger, leads to the frequent occurrence of such scenes as took place in Paris last week. The result of such impotent attempts is only trouble for those engaged in them; and, where they are made against a despotic power, or one chary of extending a large share of liberty to the people, the tightening of the bonds from which they sought to be entirely freed. It is probable Napoleon will now manifest greater reluctance to increased constitutional liberty; or, he may by clemency towards the offenders seek to ingratiate himself still more with a nation that is ever ready to applaud theatrical effects, whether in politics, private life or on the stage.

THE ELECTION.—The City Election was progressing quietly up till the hour of our going to press. Crowds were congregated at several street corners and at the City Hall, and were indulging in a considerable amount of joking, and bandying good-natured comments. The 10th Ward brass band furnished some excellent music.

OPPOSED TO IT.—The Omaha Herald, of the 11th instant says: "Many influential journals oppose the Cullom bill for the abolition of polygamy in Utah, on principle as well as on grounds of expediency. It is given out that even our 'Gentile' friends in Utah consider it an extreme measure, and it is our opinion that it is as unwise as it will certainly prove futile."
