

SHADOWS OF A CITY

AS SEEN BY A SALT LAKE WOMAN

THE recent and mysterious disappearance of a woman beloved and highly respected—an old French teacher of our city—has been a silent sorrow to her many close friends. To those who knew her not so well, a brief account of her character, history and life-work may be as good to read as that of any familiar resident of our city who has actually departed this life.

She was born more than 60 years ago in Alsace-Lorraine, and educated in a convent in Paris. In that city she taught school for 19 or more years, leaving there finally to join a brother in Canada. For several years she held the position of governess in Baltimore. From Baltimore she traveled to Ogden, Utah, where she met the man who later became her husband, and there they began a sad story. Everyone in Ogden spoke highly of the man, but a few of her closer friends did all in their power to dissuade her from marrying him. But love is blind, and the marriage took place in the Catholic church of this city.

The dear madame soon possessed a number of influential friends in Salt Lake, where she taught French privately and at Bowland Hall, when that institution was under Mr. Miller and Bishop Tuttle. She was very devoted, perfectly sincere, high-minded, simple and unpretentious. In former years, when she had money, many and generous were her acts of charity, and especially to the man—that "worse half"—who finally became her complete undoing, and the cause of her poverty in her sweet and gentle old age. Through all her trials she bravely and faithfully taught French—her only means of livelihood—taught early and late, going great distances to pupils when her years, bent figure and wavering steps, should have found her in the possession of every comfort. Her sense of humor was keen, and in the telling of witty stories and happenings, original in the extreme because of her peculiar pronunciation of English and the sad mixing of verbs common to (a) foreigners, the dear old madame forever provoked laughter and fun. She was told by many of her friends that she resembled Queen Victoria, a fact she hardly relished, owing to a little of the royal animosity particularly had this been noted and commented upon by children under her instruction in earlier years, and with the candor of youth they had not hesitated about the "queen's ugliness" whenever struck by the startling resemblance; this cause was always a great source of amusement to madame, notwithstanding her feeling in the matter. Her religion was beautiful; she found it in flowers and birds and children; God's goodness was everywhere, and for the sake of her faith she lived as few are able—"content" with small means—bearing all cheerfully, in order that the spiritual should "grow up through the common." Once she was heard to say, "Oh, when I see His face, I shall want to gaze upon it through all eternity."

A number of years after her marriage she bought a farm at Provo, ostensibly to get her husband away from certain associates and bad influence in Salt Lake, hoping to interest him in farming. But she only met with disappointment. He was nothing but an "old sport," after all, given to gambling, drinking, cockfights, badger-fights, dogfights and the sort, "wildcat" schemes, etc. He used up all the kind madame's money in that way. He had already mortgaged her home in the Twenty-first ward unknown to her; with her slight understanding of English she signed papers, without knowing their exact import, the man gaining by the transaction. This all pertained to schemes that would bring big returns.

Madame was very industrious, and for the sake of saving the man she devotedly loved, she broke herself down on the farm, willingly in her service of love and soul-saving did she do as the man bade her—or rather made her if the truth will out—and that? The manual labor, the pulling of the plow, the carrying of loads of water, etc. Later, when he mortgaged the little farm, and she really began to comprehend his real character, her love turned to hate. The last few years she practically separated herself from him. She used the front room of their modest apartment for schoolroom, millinery, kitchen, etc., while he lived in the back room. And even after all his treachery and brutality she did not leave him, but through their separation, he played upon her sympathy on the plea of ill health, and everyone knew that while she supported him in her old age with her few French pupils, he was quite able to work.

Poor Madame! She left Salt Lake without letting any of her friends know how, when, or where she went. She had hinted for sometime, however, that she might go to California or France; for while she grew old and a few, she had managed to get by a little money. She took with her simply her wearing apparel and a few personal effects, dear to her. Her room and furniture were left in order as though she had just gone on a short visit, or to give a lesson. Even her dear old black "Tom," her faithful cat, and all she had had to love for so long, sat for days on the front window sill the same as when his mistress was there.

Her husband thought she was sick and gone to some hospital, she had complained of not being well for some time. When he really found out she was gone for good—finding a note from her to that effect—he seemed touched deeply for a time. But he soon revived and immediately disposed of all the furniture to a second-hand man.

It has been ascertained of late, that the dear, faithful old Madame went to a brother in France, who is a priest, under the care of a member of her church.

New Treasure Island Syndicate.

Which is Forming in England to Exploit.

HERE is a delicious smack of romance in the prospectus of the Collis Diamond Syndicate, Limited, and the strange documents which accompany it, suggestive rather of the imaginative pen of a Stevenson or a Quiller Couch than of the prosaic type machine of the ordinary company promoter.

Mr. William Griffith, F.G.S., who describes himself as late manager and consulting engineer to De Beers Syndicates—there is a subtlety about the interpolation of the word "Syndicates" that ought not to be overlooked—has been before a commissioner for oaths in the borough of Aberystwyth and has sworn to a truly remarkable yarn.

Nine years ago, in Cape Town, he encountered one Capt. Jones, a master mariner in the British mercantile marine. In the course of their several conversations Capt. Jones disclosed a wondrous tale of diamonds that were to be found on an unnamed island off the coast of South Africa, whither, in or about the month of July, 1897, he betook him in a sailing ship with a crew of Cape boys, returning, some four months later, with a pocket full of dazzling stones.

Mr. Griffith, modest man though he be, has a firm belief in his own knowledge of what is what, and, having been privileged to cast eyes on some £10,000 or £15,000 worth of Capt. Jones's diamonds, he then and there formed the opinion that the stones "were from an unknown mine, as the crystallization was entirely different from the stones obtained from Kimberley, De Beers, and other mines."

When Capt. Jones landed in Cape Town, upon his return from the mysterious island, he was ill, and gradually getting worse, he unfortunately died some 10 or 14 days afterward. Before his death, however, he presented Mr. Griffith with "a chart or map," which should enable him to locate the island upon which the diamonds were to be found, "as it would be of more use to him than any one else."

Mr. Griffith inexplicably has allowed the whole matter to rest for the intervening nine years, but it has suddenly occurred to him that the best use to which he can put the "chart or map" bequeathed to him by the adventurous Capt. Jones is to sell it to a company. The Collis Diamond Syndicate is the result. Its capital is a modest £25,000, of which about two-thirds, including the whole of a block of deferred or "founders' shares," so to Mr. Griffith.

Money is being raised to take up the balance of 7,500 shares to be employed in the fitting out of an expedition to go in search of the mysterious island on the coast of Africa, which, as the prospectus naïvely admits out, "is situated in a locality which is clearly marked on the admiralty chart."

Accompanying Mr. Griffith on his voyage of discovery will be one John Frederick Webb, late consulting engineer to two machinery companies, and Capt. Frederick G. Jackson, leader of the famous Jackson-Harmsworth expedition of 1894 to 1897. Whether this doughty explorer will get nearer to the mysterious island than he did to the North Pole, time alone can decide.

In the meantime, those who subscribe to the 7,500 shares now on offer—after having their appetites whetted with reminders of the "unparalleled history of the De Beers mine, and the more recent example of the Premier"—are assured that if the expectations of the directors are realized, a great diamond corporation will be formed to develop the undertaking, in which the present investors will have their shares multiplied many times over.

There is much virtue in that if—London Leader.
