The Shaver's Soliloquy.

To shave, or not to shave! the question is. Whether 'tie better on the human phiz To let accumulation of our hair Cover the chins and lips which now are bare Or to continue still to sempe away The hirsute ornament from day to day; To lather, shave, perchance to gash the facel Ay, there's the rub; for, in this latter case. What mis'ry's outs! 'Tis this must give us pause, And make us rather let alone our jaws, Than by continuance in the barb'rons use Cut, scratch and lacerate them like the deuce For if it actually were the case That Nature never meant the human face To be so teased and tortured as it is-If so, I say, why then what business Have mortals virtually to cry out That Nature knew not what she was about Why, since the beard was evidently meant To grow, should men be soom'ng, intent On trying to prove Nature was a dunce, And did not know her trade? Why not at once Pluck out the evel-rows and extract the nails. And shave the heads of females and of males Strange teathat men should we rakip fashion so As to be willing thus to undergo The pains of shaving, rather than permit Mustache and heard to grow as they think fit How singular, that men should still delight In torturing their faces; when they might Themselves their comfort, case and health obtain By vowing they will never shave again; But his the dread of ridleute and scorn Makes the foul fashion easy to be borne. Thus custom of us all doth cowards make; And for this savage custom, then we take The trouble and the pains our chins to mow, Because it is fashion to do so. But thus our chins will soon no more, I hope, De lather'd oe'r with the pale suds of soap, Soon shall moustache and beard once more on all Our chins wag merrily, in street and hall!
