HAS SPAIN BEEN ENOUGH?

The complete destruction of Admiral Cervera's squadron, the most formidable of the fleet, in which Spain relied for the present war, and the prospective fall of Santiago, should not be taken as a sign of the end of the war. After Manila and Santiago, Spanish honor ought to be satisfied, and the peace might be justified in taking the military steps necessary to secure the peace. The peace is not a matter of life and death, but of honor.

But will Spain now see for peace? It is reported that the greatest alarm is felt in the Spanish government, and that the Spanish people are in a state of panic. The Spanish government is in a state of confusion, and the Spanish people are in a state of panic. The Spanish government is in a state of confusion, and the Spanish people are in a state of panic.

There are, however, evidence that the peace party is growing in strength. The peace party is growing in strength, and the war party is losing ground. The peace party is growing in strength, and the war party is losing ground. The peace party is growing in strength, and the war party is losing ground.

Spain is approaching a critical period. The peace party is growing in strength, and the war party is losing ground. The peace party is growing in strength, and the war party is losing ground. The peace party is growing in strength, and the war party is losing ground.
