

Prest. Garfield's Assassin.

As He Appeared to a Brooklyn Man, Who Had Business Dealings With Him.

THE first time I ever saw Charles J. Guiteau, who afterward achieved notoriety by shooting President Garfield, was in the office of Granville P. Hawes of 170 Broadway, New York.

"It was back in the year 1873, before I was admitted to the bar. I was managing clerk for Hawes, and Guiteau was a tenant, having desk room in the office for about three months.

"He was slight of build, of medium height, giving an impression of smallness. His face was thin, pale, unhealthy, with sparse straggling beard, parted at the chin, ill-kept, like his hair. He had a furtive manner, look-cunning, secretive, scared-like a fellow on the run. He had had a seamy sort of past, been a preacher of free love, a member of the Oneida Community, and was forth. But these things about his past I did not know till afterward.

"As I have said, I was a young fellow, filling the place of managing clerk, and therefore, pretty busy, so that I had not much time for observing Guiteau. What I did see of him filled me with dislike. His entire personality was squalid and repulsive, and his manners were rough, coarse and brutal.

"His vanity was of that large sort that does not care for personal adornment, and it was just as well, for no amount of good dressing could ever make Charles J. Guiteau good-looking.

"His tongue argued questions of state. He used to come to the office in the morning primed to argue on the leading topics of the day, but no one could argue with him long, for his idea of retort was to call his opponent a liar. He was exceedingly impatient of opinion that did not agree with his own.

"Guiteau when I knew him was trying to do a collection business and anything else in the way of law that he could. He never tried a case in court, but that was nothing against him. I remember the years when I never had a case to try.

"But Guiteau did a lot of little shady things that helped to stamp the bad impression he had made deeper in my mind, and finally led to his leaving the office where I was employed.

"As managing clerk it was my duty each week to make out a check whereby to pay the office boys and reimburse myself for any expenses I had been at. This check was signed by Mr. Hawes and then a clerk took it to the bank on Saturday morning and got the money.

"Guiteau knew this, and one Saturday morning he lay in wait for the clerk with the check and told him that I owed him $5 and had said he was to receive it out of the check.

"The clerk accepted this as truth and gave him the $5 and afterward came back and told me. I informed him that Guiteau had lied and swindled him, and he was very angry.

"On Monday morning when Guiteau appeared, the clerk whom he had defrauded pounced upon him, insisting on the return of the $5. Guiteau saw that he was in a bad way, and said: 'That $5 or I'll whip you,' said the clerk. 'You're in danger of getting whipped every time you come in here without the money. You are in danger of getting whipped right now.'

"Guiteau blustered and threatened, but he went and got the money, which closed that particular incident.

"After the shooting of Garfield the papers came out with the assassin's name spelt Gatto and a variety of other ways. At last they settled down to 'Guiteau' and I got a letter from the West written by this clerk who had the encounter with the murderer in our office. He wrote:

"If the assassin of the President is, as I suspect, our old friend Charles J. Guiteau, who had desk room in Hawes' office while we were there, you and I divide a great responsibility between us, because if either of us had knocked his head off, as we should have done, he could not have committed the crime.

"After Guiteau returned the $5 out of which he had swindled the clerk, he pursued his dark and devious little ways in our office for some time. One of his methods of raising money was quite ingenious. He got up a circular, quoting a pretended decision of the supreme court to the effect that he owned the patent for the process of polishing precious metals by the use of rouge.

"I suppose that the whole thing was a swindle. My father, who was a manufacturing jeweler, told me that this method of polishing the precious metals had been used in the trade for upward of 100 years or more, and that there could have been no patent issued for it—that, in fact, rouge was the only substance used for the polishing of gold.

"Guiteau used to send the circular around to the small jewelers, more than half of whom are foreigners, who can hardly speak the English language, and knew nothing about the law. After a little while he would follow the circular up by calling on the jeweler and threatening him with an action for infringing his patent. Then he would settle the false claim for whatever he could get—the amount of the victim's pile—from $5 to $25. Of course, I did not know this when he was in our office.

"About this time one of his escapades was in the matter of Winston against English. English was the editor of an insurance paper, and Winston was the president of the Mutual Life Insurance company. English made an attack on the Mutual Life and Winston, and the latter sued him for criminal libel. English went to Ludlow street jail, and Guiteau procured $300 from him to bail him out.

"He secured the bail, but it turned out afterward to be a straw bond, and English sued him for the $300. Guiteau defended on the ground that when he agreed to procure bail, he did not agree to furnish sureties who were sound. Of course, he was beaten.

"This was not the only proceeding against Guiteau, while he was in my sight. It was brought by a man who had formerly been his client. Guiteau had agreed to collect a claim, he to receive half.

"He collected some money, but gave none to his client, who sued, and he defended on the ground that what he had collected was his share, and his client could have no interest in it. The court naturally took another view of the matter.

"He terminated his stay in our office by reason of a row that he had with me that I think, admirably illustrated the egotism of the man. I was alone with him in the office one afternoon when I observed him in Mr. Hawes' room looking the door of the safe.

"I went in and getting between him and the door demanded the safe key, which he refused to give me on the ground that he had papers in the safe, and did not care to intrust the key to any other person. I told him I would take the key from him by force. He would not give it up, and so we had a scuffle, and I took the key from his pocket, tearing the pocket a little in the operation.

"He complained about me in the morning, but I told my side of the story, and Mr. Hawes concluded that he had better lose a bad tenant than a good clerk. Guiteau went.

"His papers that were in the safe were of no consequence, and he had begged permission of Mr. Hawes to deposit them there, yet he made them an excuse for claiming to own the whole concern.

"Guiteau was an active, zealous man, very busy about the smallest things, hunting for a living. What I had against him were apparently trifles and when I went to Washington to tell what I knew about him on his trial I heard 200 witnesses whose knowledge was like my own. They accused him of innumerable trifling frauds.

"Taken in detail these affairs seemed almost too small to consider, but they made up an aggregate that justified the declaration of so many that he was 'the wickedest man they ever met' and that he seemed to study to find out what was the wickedest and meanest thing he could do and then go and do it.

"One very respectable witness swore that seven years before the shooting of Garfield he had heard Guiteau say that if he could not win fame any other way he would attract the attention of the whole world to himself by killing some great man.

"Guiteau's counsel denounced this witness most violently and threatened to indict him for perjury and I met him at a Washington hotel on the night after he had given his testimony and found him feeling very unhappy. He said that he knew his story sounded unlikely, but nevertheless it was true. Guiteau had really made the declaration he attributed to him.

"No one believed the witness at the time, but in a few days a man who had formerly been associated with him wrote to say that he was present and remembered perfectly when Guiteau made the declaration. This man was brought on to Washington and made his declaration so that there were two responsible witnesses who swore that seven years before Garfield assassinated Guiteau he had made up his mind to kill some great man if he could not get the eye of the world in any other manner.

"I have always insisted that Guiteau was not crazy, but a morbid and abnormally bad man. He had a sort of malformation of the mind, an intensely evil disposition. He hated everything good, despised everything high and revered the lifting of any man above him. In his own mind he was according to the legal definition. He knew perfectly the nature and quality of his act and the difference between right and wrong.

"At the time that Guiteau shot Garfield he had not a son in the world. He had lost his little place in the secretary of state's office and could not get back. 'He was a vagabond.'

"The law struck for him to carry out his idea of killing some great man. So he shot Garfield, and having failed of winning the applause for which he was hungry, gained instead the universal execration which suited him as well and in which he revelled for months."—Sydney Reid in Brooklyn Citizen.

THE LAST OF THE JACKSONS

Faithful Old Uncle Alfred, Guardian of the Hermitage.

Special Correspondence.

Nashville, Oct. 21.—The last of the Jacksons has just died at The Hermitage. General Andrew Jackson's old home. He was a negro, Uncle Alfred Jackson, ninety-nine years old, according to his own computation.

Uncle Alfred was a pikanunny in the negro quarters of The Hermitage when the little boy was adopted at the big house and named Andrew Jackson, Jr. He was there when the battle of New Orleans was fought. He was there when Mrs. Rachel Jackson died, when General Jackson went to Washington to be inaugurated president, and when the old hero breathed his last on June 5, 1845.

Betty, the cook in the Jackson house for half a century, was Uncle Alfred's mother, and he was born in one of the two cabins still standing at The Hermitage. He died in the same room where he first saw the light.

Uncle Alfred's education was not advanced. Before the war negroes were not taught as they are now, but what he lacked in book learning he made up in memory and aptness. He knew the history of the Jackson family from the beginning to the end, and no man had a more faithful biographer than did General Jackson. Uncle Alfred's last days at The Hermitage were made happy by the visitors to the shrine which he guarded and who would listen unthinkingly to his stories of his great master.

Alfred married Grace, maid of Mrs. Jackson. When the emancipation proclamation was issued most of the slaves left The Hermitage, but Alfred and Grace remained with the family through all its vicissitudes. Andrew Jackson, Jr., died in 1895, leaving his wife and her widowed sister the only occupants of the old house. His sons had entered the Confederate service, and only one had survived. His only daughter had married and moved away. Alfred and Grace were the only servants, but the little family continued to live in the antebellum ways.

After the death of Mrs. Jackson and her sister, Albert and Grace were all that was left of the family at The Hermitage. When the Ladies' Hermitage association was formed to preserve the house as a monument to the victor of New Orleans, Alfred was left in sole possession. He was loyal to his charge. For fifty years he never spent a night away from the old cabin in which he was born.

His last night was spent there, and his relatives and friends held a prayer meeting in the old cabin. The next day the body was carried to the house and placed in the great hall, where the funeral services were held under the direction of The Hermitage association. Then the faithful darky was buried back of the house, within a few feet of the grave of his beloved master.

A Freeman's Close Call.

"I stuck to my engine, although every joint ached and every nerve was racked with pain," writes C. W. Dellamy, a locomotive freeman, of Burlington, Iowa. "I was weak and pale, without any appetite and all run down. As I was about to give up, I got a bottle of Electric Bitters and, after taking it, I felt as well as I ever did in my life." Weak, sickly, run down people always gain new life, strength and vigor from its use. Try them. Satisfaction guaranteed by Z. C. M. I. Drug Dept. Price 50c.
