lying upon the slippery ledge, half in the water and half out of it. As she looked at him—in that instant, she could see that his eyes were open and that he was struggling with his hands. "Hold by the hook, Barty," she cried, pushing the stick of it before him, while she seized the collar of his coat in her hands. Had he been her brother, her lover, her father, she could not have clung to him with more of the energy of despair. He did contrive to hold by the stick which she had given him, and when the succeeding wave had passed by, he was still on the ledge. In the next moment she was seated a yard or two above the hole, in comparative safety, while Barty lay upon the rocks with his still bleeding head resting upon her lap.

What could she do now? She could not carry him; and in fifteen minutes the sea would be up where she was sitting. He was quite insensible, and very pale—and the blood was coming slowly, very slowly, from the wound on his forehead. She set herself to work and she moved him almost lifting him. As she did so she wondered at her own strength, but she was very strong at that moment. Slowly, tenderly, falling on the rocks herself so that he might fall on her, she got him back to the margin of the sand, to a spot which the waters would not reach for the next two hours.

Here her grandfather met them, having seen at last what had happened from the door. "Dada," she said, "he fell into the pool yonder, and was battered against the rocks. See there at his forehead."

"Mally," said the old man, "they'll say we murdered him."

"Who'll say so?" Who'll lie like that? Didn't I pull him out of the hole?"

"What matters that? His father'll say we killed him."

It was manifest to Mally that whatever any one might say hereafter her present course was plain before her. So she ran with all her speed in the direction of old Gunliffe's house, and as she drew near to the homestead she saw that Barty's mother was leaning on the gate. As she approached she attempted to call, but her breath failed her for any purpose of loud speech, so she ran on until she was able to grasp Mrs. Gunliffe by the arm. "Where's himself!" she said, holding her hand upon her beating heart that she might husband her breath.

"Who is it you mean!" said Mrs. Gunliffe, who participated in the family feud against Trenglos and his granddaughter. "What does the girl clutch me for in that way?"

"Barty's dying then, that's all."

By this time Mrs. Gunliffe was in an agony of despair, and was calling out for assistance lustily. In a very few minutes she was hurrying across the field again towards the path to the cove, and Gunliffe with the other man and his wife were following her. As Mally went along she recovered her voice, and tried to explain to the father what had happened, saying but little of her own doings in the matter. The father as he went said little. He was known as a silent sober man, well spoken of for diligence and general conduct, but supposed to be stern and very hard when angered. As they drew near to the top of the path the other man whispered something to him, and then he turned round upon Mally and stopped her. "If he has come by his death between you, your blood shall be taken for his," he said. Then the wife shrieked out that her child had been murdered, and Mally looking round into the faces of the three saw that her grandfather's words had come true.
