Prize Potato Raising.

[CONCLUDED.]

S. R. De Wolfe, Parsons, Nova Scotia, cut to single eyes and planted in hills three feet apart, one eye to a hill, May 29. Soil fine, rich, moist loam, with a slight mixture of clay, ensuring natural drainage. Ground spaded and common barnyard manure partly rotted spread on at a rate of about five tons to the acre, and turned under. At the time of planting, a fertilizer composed of ashes, sand, lime, etc., was applied. Was put into the hills at the rate of about one pint to each. The potato shoots were very long when planted, and being put in flat, largely increasing the yield. Holes three times, kept clear of weeds and mellow, using a spading fork between the hills July 15. Dug Oct. 6.

A. W. Titus, Wilmington, Vt., planted May 27, four feet apart each way, making forty hills to each of four rows, set in an acre. Soil light loam, with a heavy gravelly clay subsoil, not drained. Plowed two inches deep, and manured with a compost made of leaf mold taken from a maple grove, where sheep and cattle had lain, and mixed with droppings where cows were pastured. Two bushels of ashes were added to each hill, and manured with a handful of lime at the time of planting. Cut to single eyes, dividing them into three pieces, each piece to a hill. Used as fertilizer the following mixture, a handful in each hill at the time of planting: two bushels of lime mixed with water, covering in a layer of fine sand and then covered with wood ashes until dry enough to handle. Cultivated only twice with common cultivator, hoeing with a garden hoe at the same time. Think that with a favorable season would have had a yield of not less than one thousand bushels per acre, but the season was very hot and dry. Dug Sept. 17.—New York Tribune, Jan. 12.

tubes of both varieties grew of very uniform size, with but few overgrown ones and scarcely any small ones. Dug Sept. 10—24.
