

THE NEWSPAPER SUPPLEMENT.

GREAT SALT LAKE CITY, WEDNESDAY, MAY 31, 1886

[From the New York Dispatch.]
WOOLING THE MINISTER.

BY JAMES CLARK.

When the Circle convened on the Thursday following Mr. Wakefield's debut, Sophronia and Diana met each other with a coolness which contrasted singularly with the heat in which they had parted on the preceding Sunday. They scarcely spoke to each other during the whole day, but had a good deal to say against each other.

Shortly after the scraps had been collected and things made tidy, the gentlemen began to make their appearance, and among others, Mr. Wakefield, escorted by Deacon Deadset. The latter performed the ceremony of introduction, and soon the young clergyman found himself on terms of easy familiarity with the bulk of his female parishioners. He thought himself in a fair way of spending an agreeable evening. He was no mean conversationalist, and greatly enjoyed the society of ladies of a lively and pleasant turn, and not too learned.

But if he had counted on any such levity as frivolous recreation, he was not long in discovering that there were others who "meant business." He was painfully convinced of this when seated between Miss Deadset and Miss Spankem, he found himself flanked on the right by Doddridge's "Rise and Progress" and Baxter's "Call" and on the left by Butler's "Analogy," and Paley's "Evidences."

"Mr. Wakefield, (from the left) "don't you think Bishop Butler has triumphantly confuted the materialistic argument against the immortality of the soul, by suggesting that it may be one of the ultimate particles of matter, and therefore indissoluble by death?"

"Whatever—"

But whatever the party interrogated was going to observe, was cut short by: "Mr. Wakefield," (from the right) "did it never occur to you, as a pleasant reflection that the final doom of the unconverted, who have been guilty of the sin of rejecting Baxter's 'Call,' will be much more terrible than the fate of those who went to their account before that admirable treatise was written?"

"Really, I cannot—"

(Still from the right:) "Of course, you cannot; nobody can avoid a feeling of satisfaction at the thought,"

(Left:) "Which do you consider the more tenable position—that of Dr. Paley; that the evidences of revealed religion are perfectly conclusive, or that of Bishop Butler, that they have been purposely left obscure in order to try the Christian's faith?"

The necessity of venturing an opinion on this knotty point, was kindly removed by a tirade from the right on the subject of novels and novel reading, in the course of which Cooper was set down as an infidel, because he makes Natty Bumppo say in the "Pioneers" he "never know'd preaching to come into a settlement, but it made game skearce and raised the price of gunpowder;" while the taste of those who preferred the productions of the author of "Waverley" to "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," was scathingly criticised.

Left finally "dropped into poetry," quoting extensively from "Paradise Lost," with which her parsing exercises had rendered her somewhat familiar.

Right, on the other hand, betook herself to psalmody, and returned a broadside from Dr. Watts.

Not more devoutly did Wellington, watch in hand, pray for night or General Blucher, than the besieged and betackled clergyman longed for the hour of adjournment; and when it came, and he once more breathed freely, he found himself unconsciously querying, whether if Job, instead of being delivered over to the tender mercies of Satan, had been overwhelmed by an avalanche of polemical divinity in crinolines, he would not have deserved greater credit for holding fast to his integrity.

As for the Theological Amazons, they withdrew from the field, each convinced that she had made a conquest of the parson—at least to her opinions—although he had not been permitted to complete a single sentence.

How singularly the odds and ends of facts and fancy are patched together in our dreams. If they are not under the influence of some Puck or Robin Goodfellow, they are often fantastic enough, at least, to put philosophy to her trumps. Was it not strange, for instance, that the chastened imagination of the staid Sophronia, amid the visions of the night, should have transported her to the bed-side of the

THE wool must be washed clean and be picked,

and there should be one pound of grease

brought to every 7 pounds of wool, all the wool should be brought to the mill to be gaged, as it can be done more evenly there.

I understand that the last season against the

Carder whom I employed, because the wool

being poorly carded, cut up, etc., though he professed to be an excellent carder; this season I intend to remedy this, and if good work cannot be done I will stop the machine; I believe that justice ought to be done to customers.

Give us clean, well-picked wool and we will give you good rolls. My price for carding is 12 1/2 cents per pound in gold or its equivalent, or one-sixth of the wool.
