

Germany's New Literary Methods

ONE of the most satisfactory symptoms in the German publishing world is the tendency to forsake the methods of Prof. Dryden and to write even his torical records in a manner that makes them most readable as often as good works of reference. If it is argued that this is not a tendency but a happy survival of the great age of German literature, I would reply by inquiring how many German histories contain anything but so interesting as, for example, Mommson's chapter on Sulla. Some years ago a thrill of horror would have passed up one's spine at the suggestion that one should look up "something about ancient Egypt" in a German textbook. Conceive the appalling consistency of such a work, the wicker of little dissertations on the date of the Exodus and the brain-forging excursions on ancient Egyptian skull measurements! Perhaps I am prejudiced, but at least this is committed in good company. And anyhow the complaint would not be unjustified, for Hermann Schneider has written a most interesting as well as instructive monograph on the subject in the series, "Development of Mankind," published by Vogtlander in Leipzig. It is a most interesting and instructive monograph, and it is worth reading for its own sake, and of how many monographs is that true? You come across a chapter on Egyptian poetry and romance, and scattered through its columns are such glimpses of eastern entertainment as "The Sailor's Adventure" and "The History of the Peasant Who Could Speak." It may be that you do wrong to picture that sailor gazing his ancient Egyptian ship over ancient Egyptian seas through the arch of all experience, to "that untraveled world whose margins fade forever and forever."

Nor are you necessarily right in imagining a rectangular peasant and dressing uniform inscriptions to triangular beasts. But Hermann Schneider leaves them in pictures and yet puts flesh and blood round the angles of man and beast. Further, there is, for example, a pathetic little word-picture of the Egyptian schoolboy set to work out this problem: "A man has seven cats. Each cat eats seven mice. Each mouse eats seven ears of corn. Each ear has seven grains, and each grain produces a sevenfold crop. Count the total number of cats, mice, ears of corn, grains, and harvest." Then you are told that the Egyptian schoolboy was taught to reckon in the scale of seven. And I know of a German Cicero-primer which begins with the most human document Cicero ever wrote: that postscript to a letter—"Give my little Tulliola a kiss, because she's such a jolly little kid!" There is hope for a nation that learns to know its Cicero first as a good-natured gentleman, and last as a literary stylist. Somewhat on the same lines is the series of illustrated school books of which a small exhibition has lately been on view in Berlin under the auspices of the Typographical society. Historically, the exhibition is as significant as a good collection of old children's books which show the sense of color is not so new as it is sometimes supposed. The collection of modern colored school books from the baby-primer upwards is a fresh sign of the tendency to introduce young readers to subjects by exciting their interest—"litterae humaniores" in a new sense—London Tribune.
