OLD FOLKS' DAY.

The annual reunion of "Old Folks" will occur tomorrow, Tuesday, at the beautiful resort, Lagoon, where the hospitality of Mr. S. Bamberger, President Grant and citizens of Davis county will be extended to them. We hope the day will be a pleasant one, and that it may pass without any accidents. The "Old Folks" have been singularly favored in this respect in the past, and we hope the outing tomorrow will not prove an exception.

The invitation is, as always, extended to all men and women over seventy years of age, without regard to creed, color, or social position. The committee in charge will be pleased, we believe, to have the assistance of citizens generally to the extent of reminding "Old Folks" of their acquaintances, who may not themselves read the papers, of this glorious event, and of assisting them, if necessary, to get off, so that no one shall be forgotten. The annual reunion is a great event which none of the "Old Folks" should miss because they did not know of it, or because they did not know where to get the tickets. Bishops of wards and ministers will, undoubtedly, see to it that no members of wards or churches are overlooked, but there are perhaps some "Old Folks" who do not belong to any such organizations, and they too, should be remembered. They, too, are welcome.

The "Old Folks' day is, we believe, a distinct characteristic of Utah. The idea was first conceived here, and carried out in the spirit of broad-mindedness that marks every undertaking that has its origin in the gospel of the Redeemer. It has had its imitations elsewhere. Someone said, in substance, years ago, of Elder C. R. Savage, that if he had no other good deed to his credit on the great day of final accounting, his faithful work in connection with the "Old Folks" day ought to insure him of eternal reward. It can be said also that if "Mormonism" had no other fruit to offer the world in proof that the tree is good, this would be sufficient. But it is only one of the many evidences of its divine origin.

THE EASTERN QUESTION.

The changed attitude of the Russian representative at the Hague, since the first peace congress, and the changed tone of Japan with regard to the troubles in San Francisco, may both be explained by the fact that the peace of Portsmouth is not accepted as the final settlement of the quarrel between Russia and Japan, but only as a temporary truce. If Russia expects to renew hostilities at some future time, in order to continue her progress toward the Pacific, the utterances of M. Nelidoff at the opening of the congress, to the effect that permanent peace is a dream, an idea that cannot be realized, assume a new significance. If Japan is suspecting Russia of hostile intentions, she cannot afford to invite trouble with other nations, for a war with any other first-class power would be Russia's opportunity. Great Britain would not be bound to come to the rescue of her ally, if the war was one of Japan's own making and not a war of defense. And the Japanese government cannot fail to appreciate the danger of playing with war fire at this time.

In view of the present status of the eastern situation, the facts presented and the opinions offered by R. L. Putnam Weale in his "The Truce in the Far East and its Aftermath" are of considerable interest. He claims that Russia has by no means given up her policy of striving for an outlet to an ice-free sea. She accepted temporarily the necessity of acknowledging defeat, but she was not really conquered. On the contrary, Russia, when the peace treaty was signed, had in the field 125,000 officers, 917,000 men, 270,000 horses, and 1,000 guns. Such a mighty force of men, the author says, as was finally collected together at the front by the Russian government exceeded by a few thousands the massed Japanese armies, and was as great as any that has ever gathered on an actual battlefield. The vast majority of these Russian soldiers were entrenched far south of the Sungari river and offered a problem so unenviable that the picked leaders of Japan decided that peace was preferable to attempting any warlike solution.

Nor were the losses of Russia very considerable. They are thus enumerated:

"First—Her insignificant maritime province at the extremity of the Liaoting peninsula. Second—A strip of the Central Manchurian railway measuring 600 versts, and 450 miles in length. Third—The possibility of dominating one province of Manchuria, viz. Fengtien. Fourth—She has lost the possibility of being able directly to menace Korea from across the Yalu. Against these net and absolute losses in territory and prestige, however, must at once be set the following facts, which are well worthy of note and remembrance. Russia still possesses the 1713 versts of the original mileage of the Manchurian railways against Japan's 660 versts. She still is the controlling Power, despite all talk to the contrary, in the two northern provinces of Manchuria, viz. Kirin and Heilungchiang. Now, Kirin has an area of 110,000 square miles, and Heilungchiang 190,000 square miles, or say a gross total of 300,000 square miles. Against this Japan has the questionable controlling interest (questionable, says the author, because she may be honest) in Fengtien province, which measures only 66,000 square miles in extent. Therefore, of the original railway system in Manchuria Russia still possesses, say, four-fifths, and of the gross area of Manchuria she has a controlling interest over, say six-sevenths."

The author holds that Russia's position in Manchuria is now much stronger than it was before the struggle with Japan, and that the outcome of a new conflict waged by a people conscious of its mission will be far different from that which was carried in spite of the people.

It is evident that Japan's policy now must be one of peace with all the world, so as not to invite Russia to make an attack in the rear. Japan is very nearly in the position in which Germany found herself after the humiliation of France. She must exercise eternal vigilance against the conquered enemy and exert herself to the utmost to keep her army and navy in such a condition as to discourage a single-handed attack. While she is looking after Russia, she cannot afford to bid defiance to any other power.

BEWARE OF STRIFE.

We are in receipt of a copy of a paper called Solidaritet, printed in the German language. It claims to be the official organ of the sick and health benefit fund of the working men of the United States, and to speak officially for a number of laborers.

On the first page it presents a set of resolutions relating to the Haywood trial, adopted at a recent convention of laborers. These resolutions not only acquit the accused miners in advance, but they denounce the Governors of Idaho and Colorado as conspirators and law-breakers; they characterize President Roosevelt as a hypocrite who holds his office by the grace of a Railroad king and through the corrupting campaign fund of Wall street, and they urge members to use the ballot "as the most formidable weapon in the class war now raging."

All through the paper this tone is perceptible. Everybody who holds an office in this country seems to be regarded as a scoundrel, and everybody who has been successful in business is branded as an oppressor, a tyrant.

We submit that that kind of talk is entirely out of order in this country. The evident intention of it is to divide the citizens into hostile camps, and to light the fires of class hatred for revolutionary purposes. This is particularly evident in the article on the trial in which it is alleged that justice cannot be expected to prevail because the jury consists of farmers and business men. Is not that an assault upon American citizens as vicious as it is uncalled for?

We can hardly believe that the workmen of this country generally will permit such incendiary talk to influence them. Were it possible to accomplish the division and kindle the flames of strife between the classes that depend on one another, the result would be financial ruin in which the laborers would be the first to suffer. Agitators who are making money out of agitation are not safe counselors in any crisis.

The attacks on President Roosevelt are very strange, since, under the policy for which his administration stands, numerous measures have been taken the ultimate object of which is the establishment of a square deal all around. President Roosevelt has done a great deal for labor. The following questions by Senator Beveridge tell a story which should not be forgotten:

"Who was it that compelled the creation of a new department of government, devoted to commerce and labor, upon which the progress of the American people depends? It was Theodore Roosevelt. Was that the work of a 'child'?"

"Who was it, when the American people were freezing for want of fuel, brought together warring capital and labor, whose conflict had created the coal famine of 1902? It was a mighty task to compel the most forceful men in the world of capital and the ablest men in the world of labor to cease hostilities that the common people might not suffer. Yet Theodore Roosevelt did that. Was that the work of a 'child'?"

"Who was it that brought to their knees the kings of the railway world—kings in reality far more than the tin-pot monarchs of Europe that wear their foolish crowns—and in the name of the American people forced needed railway legislation over their tremendous resistance? It was Theodore Roosevelt. Was that the work of a 'child'?"

"Who was it that, again, in the name of the people's health and happiness, triumphed over the greatest combination of unrighteous wealth the world has ever seen, and in the name of the people, caused the passage of the historic law for pure food and healthful meats? It was Theodore Roosevelt. Was that the work of a 'child'?"

Anyone who will consider the policy of the present occupant of the Presidential chair in Washington will admit that it is one friendly to the interests of labor, as well as to the country generally, whatever fault may otherwise be found with it. Strife between classes cannot be tolerated.

COMPETITION AND COAL PRICES.

Washington Herald.

The vital principle of the Government's suit is the restoration of competition, first, among the coal producers, and second, among the coal carriers. It is alleged in the Government's petition that the coal roads have conspired to stifle competition among themselves in the transportation and sale of coal, and to prevent the sale of the independent output in competition with their own, thereby establishing a monopoly. If real competition could be re-established in the coal region the price of coal would be competitive, bearing some definite relation to the cost of production and transportation. Instead of a monopoly price, fixed according to other considerations, as at present. Should the Government be able to force a resumption of competition among the coal producers, resulting in a reduction of the price of coal, a great boon would be conferred on domestic and industrial users of the commodity. Perhaps this is too much to expect, for even if the Government's suit should be successful there would still be an important element of monopoly in the control by closely affiliated interests of ninety per cent of the anthracite coal deposits.

A NEW KIND OF COLOR.

Boston Transcript.

The color of the gown which the Princess wore at the recent launching of King Edward's yacht is described as that of catmeal. There we have the new shade, or at least a new shade, that dressmakers and milliners have been sighing for. Being told that a gown is of catmeal color it is easy enough to visualize it, though the sound of it is not particularly pleasing. It is even less so than "oyster white," or "elephant's breath," tints that have had their fling for a time now. There is nothing of artistic beauty or of poetic flavor in the name of the new shade and this seems rather a pity since it is born in an age of extreme refinement in dress making. Neither does it leave anything to the imagination, though some may think it its credit to be so literal and so homely. Others will say it is just to laugh when they hear it and will wonder if we are to be put straight through the long list of breakfast foods for colors and tints, now that we have started with oatmeal, the oldest of them all.

IS JAPAN SPYING ON US?

Providence Journal.

The story of the arrest of a suspected Japanese spy at Newport is interesting, if not important. The principal testimony against the suspect appears to be that a fellow Japanese was seen to approach him with a military salute, the inference being that he has at some time in the past been an officer in the mikado's service, although he occupies a humble position in Uncle Sam's employment now. It is entirely possible that Japan has her secret representatives engaged in mental work within our American fortifications. Her spies have been active in other countries have been active in quarters of the earth from time immemorial. When hostilities begin between two nations, the military authorities of both are pretty sure to have on file accurate plans of many supposedly secret bastions and emplacements.

SWIMMING TROOPS.

London Globe.

The feat of swimming the Tiber on horseback, which has attracted a good deal of attention during the last week in the Italian press, recalls a much more daring and practical operation of the same kind, performed under Garibaldi's orders during his fighting days in South America. While at Salto he noticed that a strong mounted corps of the enemy left in observation of the place, left their horses grazing close to the river bank, for the sake of water during the day, and withdrew them at night. Placing some riflemen under cover, he sent a party of picked horsemen, who, riding naked and bareback, dashed their charges through a deep river, 150 feet wide at midday, while the host was at breakfast, and the few hostile pickets were taking a nap. This party got the enemy's horses together, drove them to the river bank and led them safely swimming to the other side before the owners could make any real effort to prevent the coup. The hidden riflemen kept the pickets under control.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS.

A vivacious and diverting short story by Alden Arthur Knipe, whose work is familiar to readers of the best magazines, opens the Red Book magazine's fiction for July. The title is "A Love Story in a Cart" and the author's genius in giving his chapters menu headings is very original. A story which will serve to cast light on certain phases of legal practice is Hugh Peniston's "The Trial and the Bribe," while Isabel Ecclesstone Mackay's story, "The Stuff of Dreams," is one of the original short tales of the year. A delicious account of a conflict of hearts is Maude L. Radford's "Setting Hearts at Rest," and "The Derelict" by J. Gordon Smith, will serve to illuminate the extraordinary naval genius of Japhet Louis V. DeFoe. The dramatic critic, has an illustrated article on Edna May and Eleanor Robson, and among the 28 portrait studies which serve to open the issue are 14 of Miss May in many special poses. Among the other familiar names noted on the title page of the Red Book magazine for July may be mentioned: Porter Emerson Browne, Isabel McDougall, Ruth Wilson Herrick, Fred Jackson, Wallace Rice, Charles Lee Bryson and Elizabeth Newport Hepburn.—Red Book Corporation, Chicago.

"Mr. Dooley" tells about the presidential candidates in the July American Magazine. The cartoons are by McCutcheon, Roosevelt, Taft, Fairbanks, Foraker, Root, Beveridge and others are "mentioned." "A fine lot of men for any republican to choose from" an akely fine list for him to select from." Ray Stannard Baker, now one of the editors of the American Magazine, tells the story of the "Black Belt" in the current American, "Manhattan" on Island Outgrowth," the story of how "old" New York, confined by wide rivers, is bursting into New Jersey and Long Island through tunnels costing more than the Panama canal. Grondon Novins reports the new gyroscopic railway. David Grayson narrates an interview with an infidel. "The Interpreter" talks about the Moyer and Haywood case. Short stories are contributed by Will Irwin, Marion Hill, C. F. Carter, and Edith Bandard. "Fruitful" contributes extracts from "Talks with Walt Whitman."
