

A Legend of Northern New Hampshire.

In Rumney a road winds along the base of a mountain range whose precipitous sides, torn by some convulsion, attract the gaze of the awe-struck traveler. Thither, many years ago, came a man named George Thornton. Restless and dissatisfied, he had wearied out his early friends, and upon the death of his parents, he visited the new world, hoping to find himself the hero of many a wild adventure. He was brave, agile and ingenious, with a quick eye and a ready hand. True to his characteristic traits, he soon wearied of the settlements, and, armed to the teeth, plunged into the wilderness. Overcome with fatigue, he crept into a cave at the place we have mentioned, put his musket in a recess at his head, and fell asleep. A whoop, a yell, a rush, and he awoke a prisoner to a band of Indians.

The feast of Green Corn was close at hand, and it was intended by his captors that his death should grace it. This he readily comprehended, and he rallied all his strength to meet the horrors of his fate. He clung to the minutes as they flew by, filling them with earnest vows and passionate supplications, of numbering each possible circumstance of suffering and terror, that nothing might find him unprepared. But love cut for him a path unknown either to strength or craft.

Winona, the flower of her tribe, with eyes full of light, and cheeks whereon the rose deepened beneath the bronze, gave her heart to the young stranger and planned his escape. Never had she seemed so gay as on the evening preceding the festival; she laughed and sang, and filled the bowls of the revellers once and again, urging them with many a wile to drink of the beverage which she had drugged with some harmless provocative of slumber. Midnight found all asleep or with dulled perceptions and heavy limbs. Pressing one hand firmly on Thornton's lips, she cut the withes that bound him, gave him moccasins and a blanket of her own embroidering, and motioned him to follow her.

Freed from his ligatures, with his recovered musket upon his shoulder, new life seemed to pour into his veins. He swam rivers, scaled heights, and crossed morasses, everywhere obliterating the traces of his flight. At the end of two days Winona paused. She instructed Thornton by signs, who went through the simple marriage ceremonies known to her, and then on bended knee, promised his Maker to remain faithful to her as his wife. She called him Orono, or "heart's fullness," and he first found in her all that he desired of happiness.

At the expiration of a year, however, the old longing returned, and as he had fled society, so he with proportionate eagerness desired its sweets. He proposed to Winona to remove with her to Portsmouth, but she shook her head. "The daughters of your tribe are fair," she answered, "they will steal the thoughts of Orono." Several times he sought her consent, but always with the same results, and he grew irritable and capricious. One day, upon returning to their cavern, after an unusually long absence, he found Winona dying, and beside her a wooden cup partly filled with the berries of the night-shade. With her last effort she threw her arms about him and expired. He frantically rubbed her stiffening limbs, kissed her icy brow, and called her by all the tender names which she had taught him. Exhaustion followed, and to this succeeded a deep and settled grief. All that she had done for him, all that she had been to him, presented itself continually to his memory and heart.

He cleared a spot for her grave among some young cedars, and carved a head cross of the same wood, near which he planted a wild rose. Then he made a rude sketch of the surrounding scenery, and set out—not for Portsmouth, now linked with saddening associations—but for Boston, which he had never visited. But he did not go alone. Winona's laugh was in the murmur of the brook, her voice in the song of the birds, the rustle of her garments in the touch of the forest leaves. He was a changed man, transformed by the grand though erring devotion of a woman who knew not that she had erred.

Twenty years afterward a pilgrim left his knapsack at the little inn of the rising town of W., and hastened to a fine grove of cedars a few miles distant. He was ill and feeble, but he remained there in spite of remonstrance and warning, and those who went the next day to seek him, found him dead on a green grave marked by a fallen cross of cedar, and a luxuriant rose which had heaped it with its soft petals.

PROGRESS OF SCIENCE.—The French photographers have succeeded, by recent improvements in producing perfectly distinct copies of the most illegible manuscripts. On old parchments, the ink, under the influence of time, assumes a yellowish tint. Now, during the photographic process, the brilliant and polished parts of the parchment reflect light much better than those where the ink has been deposited. However colorless it may appear, the ink has not lost its anti-photogenic qualities, opposed to the photogenic ones of the parchment, and, thanks to this opposition, black characters may be obtained on the sensitive surface, in return for much paler ones on the original. Photographers can also take enlarged or diminished copies of manuscripts, pictures, statues, etc. Many recent photographs, examined with a microscope, reveal to the naked eye, several of the inner impressions taken during the late eclipse, and some of the solar ones, are of this kind.

Save your Paper Rags.

The inhabitants of Utah are requested to gather up and save their worn out wagon covers, and every description of cotton and linen rags for paper making, and deliver them, from time to time, to the Bishops of the several Wards, or the 'News' and 'Mountaineer' Offices or their agents, for which, when clean, they will be allowed five cents a pound. The rags can be sufficiently cleansed in pure water, without soap.

It is expected that, in a few months, all who wish can receive paper in exchange for rags.
