

VENUS VICTRIX.

[CONCLUDED.]
And so the dream was wholly over, and Bertie Arkwright woke up knowing himself to have been a cruelly deceived man. He was shattered by the blow at first, fell down prone and utterly helpless under it. Then that phase passed, and one of recklessness, that made his poor parents' hearts bleed, set in. But, while the original good that was in this much-loved boy set in, and he checked himself in the course that was killing his mother—checked himself, and stayed at home with them a great deal, and became in all respects a sad and altered man.

"It is a wound that will not heal itself," Mrs. Arkwright said to her husband; "we must help him down; we gave him his being, and must make that being as happy as possible; his wound will not heal by itself, because he aggravates it by the thought that he has given Helen such a bitter wound. But the help the mother longed to give, she did not dare to give yet. At least it must seem that accident favored her plan, she felt, however much design in reality had to do with it. And so Mrs. Arkwright mustered what patience she could and bided her time until the summer brought the Faulknors back to the city.

"Helen Faulkner is coming here to-day, dear Bertie," she said to her son one morning, and he went on carefully brushing his hat, the red blood meanwhile mounting to his brow, but saying never a word.

"Be home in good time," Mrs. Arkwright went on; and then he said "I will, mother," and went out.

He could not get himself to the office that day. He mounted his horse and rode into the country, and then in the solitude, sternly reviewed the events of the last year. He had been weak and wicked, and he had been punished. He would do Helen the justice of telling her that he felt these things to be the truth now.

It was evening when he reached home, and Mrs. Faulkner and Helen were both sitting in the twilight with him. "Well, Bertie," they both said to him, and he was grateful that the low light did not suffer them to see his face.

But he would be brave at any cost, so he said it was "time for the lamp," and rang and ordered the lights in, and by the time they came he was prepared to show a very composed front to Helen.

A few days after this, he went to see the Faulknors, and found Helen alone. After some time he never quite knew how it came about he found himself telling Helen he bitterly repented him of that mistake of his, and that it all came quickly, "would she—could she love him again?"

"She could and would. She had been his true Helen all along, even when he was in the toils of Venus Victrix. And so, by reason of her having had such patient love for him, it all came right at last.

THE TRIP OF THE "MARY ANN."

Captain John Jones owned and sailed the Mary Ann. Captain Jones had commenced life with nothing but a strong frame, and immense determination; but these had borne fruit, and now, after many years hard labor, he had his reward. He owned and commanded two Mary Anns—one the best of the line of the canal, the other the best of the line of the canal. For, like a sensible man he had married a sensible woman; and as a mark of his appreciation of her sterling qualities, he had named his chief possession after her. And, besides wife and boat, he had as bright and pretty a daughter as ever gladdened the heart of a parent. It was vacation time, and Dolly had come home on a visit, and was going to the city with her parents to get a supply of new dresses and hats and ribbons; for Dolly liked to look pretty and be in the fashion, and the old captain was so proud of her that, saving and economical as he was on his own account, he never dreamed of limiting her, or grumbled at any expense that she incurred.

The only person attached to the Mary Ann was the boy who drove and Joe—the latter a youth, who, like his master, the captain, had risen in life from the very humblest beginnings. Half a dozen years before a barefooted little fellow, in a torn straw hat, and an immense pair of old trousers that almost swallowed him up, they were so large and so little, had applied to the captain for work, and after a good deal of cross-questioning, had been taken on trial as the driver of the Mary Ann's mules. This was Joe; and Joe had driven well, and shown himself so quick and bright, and good-natured, and as customary in such cases, the captain took him home to his own house, and sent him to school during the winter with Dolly. The next summer Joe proved himself still more useful, and in the winter, again went to school with the captain's daughter. She had been longest in attendance, and was the most advanced, and often went to school with Dolly. One day, when her brown curls over Joe's book or slate to help him out of some knotty problem in arithmetic or grammar; and in return he carried her satchel of books for her, helped her on with her overshoes, and over the snow-drifts, and was a devoted little cavalier in a hundred other ways. So it went on until Dolly was promoted from the public school to the "Young Ladies Seminary"; and henceforth he had to do his ciphering alone, and Dolly had grown such a little beauty that she had many besides Joe to carry her books for her. Dolly's going with them, was a great treat to Joe. And as soon as it was decided upon he set to work and tore down the old satchel that had been good enough until then, and out of his little savings bought and put up a gay bright-colored satchel and overcoat, and part of the boat, and rearranged the cabin, and trimmed and festooned it with evergreens and flowers, and in a dozen other ways so beautiful, and adorned the Mary Ann that she looked more like a bridal party than a sober craft laden with freight for the Albany market. Her little after-cabin was a wonderful example of the amount of comfort and convenience that can be crowded into the smallest space. It had two tiny state-rooms opening into it, and was surrounded with innumerable cushions and sofas, and was in all respects as neat and bright and dainty as possible. All Joe's labor was expended here, for Dolly was to occupy it along with her father and mother, although the cabin, when she sailed, was as rude and shabby as the other was cozy and home-like.
