Referring 20 the Psalms of David, Dr. Skinner spoke of the sweet influence their singing had upon the souls of men. The words were most beautiful and in fancy the reader could see the author writing them, and bringing him-self face to face with the condition of which he wrote. "Mainy of the figures of our speech have been borrowed from or our speech have been borrowed from the occupations of men. For example, "Strike while the Iron's hot," comes direct from the forge of the black-smith. "That man hit the nail on the head" comes from the carpenter's shop. "Make hay while the sun shines" re-flects the occupation of the farmer. The early accuration of David is reflected in nects the occupation of the farmer. The early occupation of David is reflected in his nineteenth Psalm. Its opening sen-tence says that he was a shepherd. The sheep industry was then a factor of civilization, as it is now. ters relationship to him much as his own relationship to the sheep. Dr. Skinner said he had been wont to regard the Paalm under considera-tion as a violation of the rules of rhetoric. These provided that no fig-ures should be employed which would demean the character of the person re-formed to the or of the person referred to. One of our well known statesmen was known to the public as "The Watchdog of the Treasury." This was clearly a violation of the rules of rhetoric, yet it was intended as a com-pliment to the party referred to. Poli-ticians were often referred to as "war-horses," a figure of speech diametri-cally opposed to theoretical standards, In his psalm David compared his Lord to a shepherd and himself to a sheep. Said he, "The Lord is my shep-herd, I shall not want." In this ex-pression he doubtless had in mind his dependence upon the Master, as his flocks depended upon him. He neaut no disrespect in using it, but perhaps was moved upon in his writings simply to reiterate some of the thoughts of his boyhood days.

In his reference to his dwelling "in the House of the Lord foreven" the speaker suggested that inasmuch as this house had not yet been builded, the expression had more of a spiritual significance than a literal one. Concluding Dr. Skinner differentiated
