

Big Square Rigger Is Fast Disappearing

THOSE who live in the large seacoast cities of this country and catch chance glimpses of the shipping of the seven seas from wharf fronts and ferry boats, probably do not realize as they see at rare intervals a sailing ship leaving or entering port how near they are to witnessing the final disappearance of the "square rigger," as a factor in international commerce.

Ten years ago statistics showed that there was a slight increase in the number of sailing ships built, particularly in Glasgow, and some shipping agents declared then that steam would never entirely drive out sail as a motive power for freight ships covering long distances, owing to the great saving in coal consumption in cases where the cargo was not perishable and time was not of prime importance. These views have not been borne out by the development of marine commerce, however, says the New York Times. The perfection of devices to save coal consumption, taken with keener competition on the part of those supplying the world's produce to get their goods to market with as little delay as possible, have made it harder and harder for the owners of deep sea sailing craft to get their cargo to market. This is true in the case of schooners, which require small crews, as it is of "square riggers," which need many hands. But even with the schooner the writing of the "square rigger" is so plain that he who runs may read.

Nowhere is the passing of the "square rigger" more manifest than in a walk along the shores of the East river in this city from Hell Gate to the Battery. Five years ago at this time of year any number of what in the old days would have been called "bachelors" could be seen passing out for trips around the Horn or for ports in the China seas. A visit to these ships was equal to six volumes of Clark Russell, and it was pleasant to sit on the deck, leaning over the railing and pick out among the "web feet" busy on the yards and strung out along the far reaching bowsprits the characters common to Russell's, Marryat's and Dana's books. With the passing of the sailing ships these heroes of youth have disappeared, where cannot be imagined, for the old sail has no place on a steamship. Salt Lake's Snug Harbor can still muster many, and there are some warrant officers in the navy who can remember their apprenticeship square riggers, but death has taken the majority and there has been no demand for youngsters to take their places.

On a bright day about a week ago one of the few old salts still left in service was found seated on an upturned bucket on the forward deck of the Mary D., a brigantine fitted out for a trip to New Zealand with an assorted cargo. The old sailor wore a knitted skull cap which he had made himself, a heavy jersey and moleskin trousers. His feet were bare. He was splicing a halyard and chewing tobacco, and though ten feet from the rail, not a drop of tobacco fell on the deck when he spat. In itself that stamped him as belonging to the old school.

It was very clear that the old sailor did not care for conversation. As a visitor came up to where he was at work and sat down on the roof of the galleyhouse near by he turned his back on the newcomer and concentrated mind and body on his task.

"You ask me how long I've been a sailor," he said, after a pause. "Well, it's high on forty-five years. I shipped out of Bedford as an apprentice when I was fifteen, and I've been at sea ever since. There are mighty few ports I haven't harbored in."

"Where do the sailors come from now that make up the crews of the sailing ships?" he asked.

"They have to take pretty much anything they can get," the sailor replied. "There aren't many able seamen left in the business, outside of a few old timers like me. The men they get on some sailing ships nowadays would drive a skipper of the old school crazy. Many of 'em hardly know the names of the spars when they ship, as for splicing and making the knots that were part of every boy's training at sea when I started in, they don't know any more about it than I see now."

"Then the skippers themselves have changed. You don't find the same kind of men commanding sailing ships today that you did when I was young. The big men who made sailing a fine art are all dead, and the men who would have taken their places in former times have gone into steam, where they can have comfortable cabins, good pay and quick passages. The ships themselves show the change. Look at this hooker I'm going to sail. She's not such an old ship, as sailing ships go, but she's all run down. No paint, decks all stained up and rigging run in any way at all. Just so long as the ship will hold together and sail after a fashion is all they care about now. It seems as if everybody was discouraged on a sailing ship and knew that no one would pay any attention to the ship, no matter how trim she looked in these days of steam turbines."

A casual inspection of the other sailing ships moored along the East river seemed to bear out all the old sailor on the Mary D. had said. Everywhere were evidences of money saved in cobbles, paint, canvas, and everything else that the next voyage might be the last.

the bay. The only persons who see a square rigger in all the glory of her spreading canvas now are the passengers on an Atlantic liner, who, at rare intervals, pass one far off on the horizon.

WANTED RESULTS.

"You are always trying to throw cold water on my literary ambitions," growled the aspiring author. "You say it doesn't pay. Look at Charles Dickens, will you? He left a fortune of $400,000, all earned with his pen."

"I know it, dear," said his wife, caressing him, "but don't you remember that Aladdin could make more than that in five minutes by simply rubbing an old lamp? I'd so much rather you'd do something of that kind, Will!"—Chicago Tribune.

MORE KILLED THAN IN WAR.

After listening to a description, by means of lantern photographs of the New York Museum of Safety and Sanitation, Col. Heistand of the United States army remarked:

"One great difference between civilization and savagery is the high value the former places upon human life and limb, and one of the mysteries of civilization is the cruelty and carelessness with which it permits human wreckage to be carried through dangerous industries. As a soldier I am particularly interested in preserving the military strength of the nation."

"I observed that under present conditions, 500,000 persons are killed or maimed in the United States every year—a number greater than the total casualties due to all our wars since the foundation of the government, and withdraws from the military strength of the country a great army every year. All proper and reasonable work which will better this dreadful condition is in the direction of a higher civilization."

First Cherries Came From Greece.

As a cultivated fruit the cherry is of eastern origin. The first garden cherries, as well as the name, have come from an old Greek town on the southern shores of the Black sea, says the London Globe.

The name of the colony was Cerasos and the inhabitants cultivated the cherry. So in Greek the cherry became cerasos, in Latin cerasus, in French cerise, in English cherry. Pliny relates that the Roman Gen. Lucullus, conqueror of the great Mithridates, brought the cherry from Cerasos to Rome. A tree laden with fruit is said to have adorned his triumphal procession.

PALACE EXTENDED 100 MOLES.

Chinese Emperor Built Many Additions to Gorgeous Mansion.

The first white man to completely explore the great wall of China, William Edgar Gell, F. R. G. S., thus describes in Harper's the Chinese emperor, Chin Shi Hwang, who built that remarkable structure:

"To superstitious notions Chin added the lust of luxury, his life being a blaze of oriental magnificence. He built a wonderful palace, which has been described in the Imperial history as having certain gorgeous annexes attached at intervals, the whole extending over a distance of 100 miles. In consequence of his life of luxury, perhaps, he became more and more preoccupied with the idea of preparing for superstition, and it may be that because of this he completed the great wall. China's design evidently was to enclose his massive empire in a rampart which should have the shape of a horseshoe with the heel corks at the ocean shores.
