Lottie Frank of Malad, a baby, also months old, met with a terrible death Wednesday morning at Vancouver, B. C., being left alone in a burning house, and when the fire was extinguished nothing remained but the charred body of scarred flesh and bones. The parents lived out away in the morning to do some work, the mother to do washing and the father to collect claims to be worked at once. Years were left in the house a two-year-old daughter, Lottie, and to her charge were Chester and Daisy, aged 5 and 3 respectively, and Daisy Frankie. Lottie went out to play, leaving the other children in the house. Chester and Daisy started to build a fire, and, according to their story, Chester poured oil from a can on the embers and then applied a match. Instantly the oil in the can was ignited and caught fire, and soon the whole house was in a blaze. Chester says he tried to carry the baby out, but was unable to get it. They then went to a neighbor's house, but by the time assistance arrived it was impossible to enter the house.
