lips, with a thrill of ecstatic delight, the precious words:

"My dear Miss Spankem, do endeavor to compose yourself; their is really no danger."

What more could he have said? Had he not held her in his arms and called her his dear, and further intimated that she needn't apprehend no danger when he was present to protect her?

With a look of ineffable tenderness, she murmured her thanks, and feeling herself sufficiently recovered to resume her walk, with a little assistance from the arm of her protector, the residue of the way was soon accomplished; when she retired to her apartment to enjoy in secret the prospective disappointment of that insufferable, hypocritical, canting, intriguing old maid, Sophronia Deadset.

But the last named damsel felt perfectly secure for all that. Although she had never fainted in Mr. Wakefield's arms (if anything could have made her faint, it would have been the bare thought of such a situation) and although he had never called her endearing names, or offered her protection, their numerous confidential religious interviews, had left no doubt in her mind of his complete sympathy with all her feelings and sentiments. Then, for a clergyman to remain a bachelor, when there are so many duties to be performed in every congregation, which appropriately devolve upon the minister's wife, was utterly inconsistent with the immutable fitness of things; and when she should be called to fill that important and responsible station, she felt was only a question of time.

Toward the close of his first year, Mr. Wakefield announced to his congregation that circumstances rendered his absence for a few weeks imperatively necessary; and that his pulpit would in the meantime, be occupied by a young friend, who had been kind enough to place his services at his disposal.
