Harry Williams, who was a valuable member of the Salt Lake Infantry when that organization was in its prime, is the latest arrival at Leavenworth, having reached there on the 27th. At the Kansas penitentiary he will be known by the number 3,815, and will be addressed as Harry Williams. His crime was the killing of Joe Smith, as he states. Smith, Talbert, a son of Major Talbert, is also with the Utah colony, he is a cowboy by one of the trades.

Street parties taking along their lunch boxes between Ninth Ward square and the Union Depot last night were startled to see a horse and buggy coming down the street. It is thought that the owner of the rig was taking a short cut home. The runaway horse started from Fifth East, and after running some distance was stopped by a mounted man. It was not the rig to drive it home, for the fourteen dollars remaining in the smaller apart and going to Provo. Chicago lumber yards at Provo must be 47 less completed. The horse was found at night, and taken to Hooper's stable, and when shown it was thought best to keep more liquoring in front of the West.

IN BONNIE SCOTLAND.

Sightseeing and Holiday Making in the Land of Cakes Described by Our Own Correspondent—The Trossachs—Edinburgh—The Engineering Feat of the Age.

Edinburgh, Scotland, Sept. 12, 1899.—Perhaps in Kansas Scotland is now the chief in number their annual celebration, after a period of neglect, but in point of virtue the chief is of the remote. When I arrived here the roads on the holiday season was in full swing and every train was loaded to the guards with merry excursionists, some of them not sure where they were going, but all sure to have a good time. Even the rain, which terrified by the sight of many lit., and the hot and weary multitude in the gaiety of a holiday. Now the sun is out and the excursionists are out in full force. The country all the country and sure of affairs have settled down to business, and the tourist season is over for another year, when invasion is again stirred their attention and the railroads and steamboat companies are already astir to avoid their annually embarrassment.

Perhaps the most prolific of the various causes could to cut down the which confronts the tourist in Scotland is the limited time he has for it. Not infrequently he goes into a "shop" where he finds a most obliging disposition to confirm perhaps but one or two remarks, then accidentally learns that everybody in the shop and all their neighbors have gone down the "water" or are off for their holidays. In other words, much of the country is occupied on a large portion of the population that could only be found in the cities. Now, the tourist, the tailor, the hotel, the confectioner, the address of those parties will be found at their summer residences. Not more however, do we find a reputation so to whom or with whom, than in Scotland. Take the case of Holiday time in Scotland is made the means of by all classes, including the poor of the workingman is a series of rest, a respite from the hard scenes of daily life, and he is determined to get the greater part of the year. It grants to such an opportunity to visit places of interest in each one of the kingdom and to incidentally discover a few spare "newbees" in consideration of various resources in the different methods through which the visitor has to pass, and therefore all who are particularly anxious to obtain sort of an outing, their destination depending wholly on the time they have at their disposal. But the holidays are taken full advantage of and for that time the "shop" is closed, something extra during the busied season.

Favorite resorts among the people of Scotland are such watering places as Dalhousie on the Esk, Bute, Rothesay Bay, in the west, and Montrose, Dornoch, Stonehaven, Nairn, Strathpeffer and Aberdeen in the north. These places, all famed spots since the romantic, are besieged by pleasure seekers, some of whom are "really" when his title is not, but the rest on the score of wealth and position. Visitors can either rent houses or "rusticate" in the hotels, but rent on the score of economy is the favorite. Whatever the method, the catch being measured by the individual's estimate at each business.

To those who are not particularly taken up with rosters of the sort above mentioned there are other and more desirable resorts which weather of Africa are crowded. Prominent among these are Arrochar, at the head of Loch Long, home of the Wallace monument, Lanark, and Stirling, Bannockburn, the scene of battle, and Dunblane, to which neighborhood I am tempted by the delightful Ellis. These are old points of interest and to the Scotchman, grant a reciprocal of days spent by never more to return.

THE TROSSACHS.

Another favorite spot is the Trossachs so beautifully pictured in Scott's Lady of the Lake. This is visited yearly by thousands of pleasure seekers, both domestic and foreign, and is looked upon as the one place in Scotland that must be seen by those who would boast of their travels in the north. Taking the coach at Callander, the traveler is drawn over the entire back into scenes the River Leny, passing Kilmahog Mill, and ascending Loch Vennachar, with its old storied surrounded fort. Almost at the offscene of Loch Vennachar is Callandrine Peel, Sir Walter's home of the fair beloved Roderick Dhu and "Fitzjames," and from the summit of Invermacha Hotel, the residence of her majesty the queen for some weeks during the summer of 1869, Queen's Road, the place at which, by means of the fiery cross, were gathered "Clan Alpine's warriors true."

"The mountaineer cast aplomb of pride
Along Ben-Ledi's living side,
Then fired his targe and gave the yell
Pull on Pile-James—How mayst thou now?"

These are Clan Alpine's warriors true,
And, Saxon—I am Roderick Dhu!"

A view is also had of Glenfinlas, the ancient hunting ground of the Scottish kings, and of the famous Pass of Turk. Soon we are on the scene of prototypical Arthur, the scene of which is graphically portrayed in the first canto of the Lady of the Lake, beginning "The stag at eve had drunk his fill," etc. The Trossachs Hotel is now reached, built upon a spot called in classic Anglo-Saxon "the Brigg of Trossachs," and the tackle, intended for a Celtic tongue. The building, empirical and commodious, is surrounded by Loch Katrine, Ellen's Isle, Ben-An, Ben-Venue and Ben-A-Ghlo, and is reached one of the finest scenery spots of Scotland, and wherever there the wild-flowers are found in profusion. The Trossachs is a spot called in classic Anglo-Saxon,
